Preface

This volume continues the Department of State series begun in 1950 with the publication of A Decade of American Foreign Policy: Basic Documents, 1941–49 (Senate Document 123, 81st Congress, 1st Session) and the subsequent publication in 1957 of American Foreign Policy, 1950–1955: Basic Documents (2 vols., Department of State Publication 6446). Annual volumes entitled American Foreign Policy: Current Documents were issued for the years 1956–1967. After an interruption, the series was resumed in 1983 with the publication of American Foreign Policy: Basic Documents, 1977–1980. Two volumes to fill in the 1968–1976 time period are being planned for future publication. In 1984 the Department revived the annual volumes with the publication of American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1981. The 1982 annual volume was published earlier this year; the 1984 volume is scheduled for publication later this year.

The volumes in this series present the principal public foreign policy messages, addresses, statements, interviews, press briefings and conferences, and congressional testimony by the executive branch of the U.S. Government. Their main focus is the contemporary public expression of U.S. foreign policy. Internal working documents relating to the policymaking process, press guidances, and telegraphic messages between Washington and posts abroad are not included in this volume unless they were released to the press and public at the time. Many documents in the present volume have already been published in other official publications. Others, including several background briefings, are printed here for the first time. Some documents issued by other governments or by international organizations or containing statements by foreign leaders have been included because they had a major impact on the formulation of the policies of the United States.

This volume covers all major foreign policy subjects and geographical areas. Comprehensive treatment of all issues in depth within the limitations of a single volume is not possible, but an effort has been made to select the most important documents on the major issues. Extracts from long documents are printed to provide the most important portions while saving space for the publication of other documents. The editors have consistently tried to balance the need for full documentation on the major crisis areas in U.S. foreign relations with less extensive coverage of a wide range of less critical but still significant issues.

The present volume is organized chronologically by functional and geographical subject in 15 chapters. The table of contents precedes a complete list of documents, a list of persons, and a list of abbreviations. An index by document number follows the text.

A microfiche supplement to this volume, scheduled for subsequent publication, will consist of several important series of background documents, such as the Department of State numbered press releases and the transcripts of the Department of State daily press briefings. Neither the printed volume nor the supplement contains cross-references to the other publication. Nevertheless, the microfiche supplement complements the printed volume in at least two ways. First, the series reproduced in it contains the full texts of many documents published as extracts in the printed volume. Second, it reproduces many important documents which relate to the compilations in the printed volume but could not be included there because of space limitations.

The preparation of this volume involved a systematic review of all major documentary sources. Documentary collections were identified and gathered from the Offices of the President's Press Secretary and the Vice President's Press Secretary; the Department of State Office of Press Relations as well as numerous other offices and bureaus of the Department; the Historical Office of the Office of the Secretary of Defense, and the Offices of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Public Affairs, and International Security Policy of the Department of Defense; the Offices of Public Affairs of the Agency for International Development, Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, U.S. Information Agency, and the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, and the Treasury; and the staffs of the various foreign affairs committees of the Congress.

Where a variety of source texts for a given document was available, the editors have selected the most primary version. Thus White House press releases are used as source texts rather than the texts subsequently published later in the Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents or the Public Papers of the Presidents of the United States. Similarly, Department of State press releases, statements, or speeches in typescript are used as the source texts instead of the same versions printed later in the Department of State Bulletin or other publications. The accuracy of these later published versions is not in question, but there are occasionally minor differences, particularly when documents are condensed by the omission of long introductory or concluding remarks which do not relate directly to the subject. An exception to this practice is the congressional hearings; in such cases the printed hearing serves as the source text.

Except for silent editing of obvious spelling errors, the manuscript versions used as source texts in the present volume have not been altered. All but the most perfunctory remarks at the beginning or end of documents ("good evening," "thank you," for example) are included. The names of briefers and of members of the press who might inadvertently have been included in the transcript of a background briefing have been deleted to preserve the anonymity of the participants; such deletions are denoted by an ellipsis of three periods. If more than the brief opening or concluding remarks or the names of participants in background briefings are omitted, the document is called an "extract." The omitted portions are identified by ellipses of three periods in cases involving less than one paragraph; omissions of an entire paragraph or more are denoted by ellipses of seven points. Except for background briefings, which required formal clearance by the appropriate executive agencies, the omissions are solely matters of editorial judgment to exclude unrelated documentation and to conserve space.

The first footnote to each document indicates the source text used; if the source text is an unpublished text, this footnote also indicates if the text is printed elsewhere. In the case of public speeches and statements, this footnote also indicates whether it is the text as actually delivered, if this information is known.

Annotation in the form of editorial notes has been used on occasion to introduce a new issue or to summarize a document (such as a special report or publication) or group of documents which could not be printed because of space limitations. These notes are designed to identify the events and to help the interested reader locate the documents. Footnotes have been used to explain references in the text and to provide cross-references to other documents or footnotes in the volume or in previous volumes in the series. The purpose of such annotation is to be helpful and informative while remaining simple and nondistracting. The editors have not attempted in footnotes to go into great detail or explain possible implications of a reference. Vague and merely allusive references in the text are not footnoted. Unpublished sources are not normally cited; but if important information derived from an unpublished, unclassified source is provided in a footnote, the source of the information is given.

Because of the multiplicity of files of unpublished sources searched for these volumes, some explanation of their citation in source footnotes is required. Department of State daily press briefings and numbered press releases, White House press releases, and the public statements of the Secretary of Defense, which are compiled in the Historical Office in the Office of the Secretary of Defense, are cited in the source notes because they are preserved intact as a series and later deposited in bound volumes or on microfiche in selected libraries. Unpublished documents are generally identified only by agency of origin, such as Department of Defense files, Department of the Treasury files, or Department of State files. More specific permanent file provenance designations are generally not possible for most contemporary documents. The editors therefore have not routinely included such information in the source footnotes. The discovery of useful documents from a variety of sources within the U.S. Government only reemphasizes the role of the American Foreign Policy series in the systematic collection and publication of many important public documents which might otherwise be retrieved later only with difficulty.

David S. Patterson directed the planning, preparation, and review of this volume. He was assisted in the review by Evans Gerakas, David W. Mabon, Nina J. Noring, and Stanley Shaloff. The compilers of each part were as follows: Chapters 1 and 2, Karen D. Bryfogle; Chapter 3, Neal H. Petersen; Chapter 4, Carol A. Becker; Chapter 5, William F. Sanford, Jr.; Chapters 6 and 9, Suzanne E. Coffman; Chapter 7, Nancy L. Golden and Ms. Coffman; Chapter 8, Lawrence P. Adamczyk and Deborah A. Peabody; Chapter 10, Charles Stuart Kennedy, Jr., Sherrill B. Wells, Ms. Coffman, Ms. Golden, and Messrs.

Gerakas, Patterson, and Sanford; Chapter 11, Evan Duncan; Chapter 12, James A. White and Mr. Gerakas; Chapter 13, Harriet D. Schwar, Donna Moss, Rosa D. Pace, Mary Grace Sergi, Ms. Golden, and Messrs. Kennedy and White; Chapter 14, Bret D. Bellamy; and Chapter 15, David S. Painter, Margaret F. Gourlay, and Ms. Golden. Vera L. Smith and Walter James, III provided research support.

Althea W. Robinson of the Publishing Services Division (Paul M. Washington, Chief) performed the technical editing under the supervision of Rita M. Baker. CDB Enterprises compiled the index.

Chapter 1. General Principles and Objectives of American Foreign Policy

Address by President Reagan Before the American Legion Annual Conference, February 22, 1983 [1]

The Quest for Peace and Freedom

Commander Keller, honored guests, and fellow legionnaires, I thank you for that warm welcome and for the high honor that you have bestowed on me.[2] And let me also thank you for the recognition you've given to a distinguished veteran and outstanding legislative leader—my good friend Bob Michel. I can't think of a more deserving recipient than Bob Michel for the Legion's Distinguished Public Service Award. I also deeply appreciate Commander Keller's recent telegram to me committing the Legion's support for our government's efforts to achieve an accounting of our missing men. (Applause)

It is always a special pleasure and honor to address the National Convention of the Legion. Each meeting is more than a joyous reunion of old comrades from days gone by; it is a reminder of those who cannot be here—those who gave their last full measure of devotion so that we and our children could enjoy the blessings of freedom in peace.

This 23d annual meeting here in Washington, my second speech to a national convention of the Legion, is a suitable occasion for taking stock. Back in August of 1980, when you gathered in Boston, I asked for your help and the help of millions of other Americans, to reverse a dangerous course America had drifted on for too long. I said then that, together, it was our duty to begin to choose a new road—a road to peace built upon a realistic understanding of our nation's strength and continuing faith in her values. America has chosen that new road. And today I'd like to report on the progress we have made in the past 2 years in our quest for peace and freedom in an uncertain world.

I know of no more appropriate forum than this convention for such a report. When Dwight Eisenhower addressed this body in 1954, he said, "To help keep America strong, to help keep her secure, to help guide her on the true path to peace, there is no group better qualified than you of the American Legion."

In recent days I have received reports from four senior members of this administration who have returned from assignments that took them to the far corners of the globe. Vice President Bush was warmly received in Europe, where he helped clear up many misconceptions about American policy. Secretary of State Shultz undertook an extensive tour of the Far East. Our Ambassador to the United Nations, Jeane Kirkpatrick, has returned from a mission to South and Central America. And my National Security Advisor, Bill Clark, reported back from conferences in Europe with our arms control negotiators, Paul Nitze and Ed Rowny. [3]

[3] Vice President Bush visited Europe from January 30 to February 10, to hold discussions and consultations regarding the Geneva talks on intermediate-range nuclear forces with leaders of seven allied governments. He visited Bonn, Berlin, The Hague, Brussels, Geneva, Rome, the Vatican, Paris, and London. While in Geneva, he met with the U.S. and Soviet INF and START delegations, and attended a meeting of the Committee on Disarmament. Secretary Shultz left Washington January 29 to consult with government leaders of Japan, China, and Korea. From January 30 to February 10, he visited Tokyo, Beijing, Seoul, and Hong Kong. U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations, Ambassador Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, visited Central America to consult with leaders of Panamá, Costa Rica, Honduras, El Salvador, and Venezuela from February 3 to 12. William P.

The reports of all these capable officials have given us a timely survey of the international scene. It's an encouraging one, marking substantial progress since that day in August of 1980 when I asked for and received your help. The international situation then was truly alarming for all who cared about America and the cause of peace and freedom. Our country was the target for countless political and terrorist attacks all around the globe. In the view of many of our friends, we had become an uncertain ally; in the view of potential adversaries, we had become a dubious deterrent to aggression. Our position in the United Nations had eroded to unacceptable levels, and our strength as a world power according to every index—moral, political, military, economic—had deteriorated to such an extent that the enemies of democracy and international order felt they could take advantage of this weakness. The Soviets sent their Cuban mercenaries to Angola and Ethiopia, used chemical weapons against innocent Laotians and Cambodians, and invaded Afghanistan—all with impunity. Perhaps the most degrading symbol of this dismal situation was the spectacle of Iranian terrorists seizing American hostages and humiliating them and our country for more than a year.

How did all this happen? Well, the answer is: America had simply ceased to be a leader in the world. This was not the exclusive fault of any one leader or party—and it will take a truly bipartisan effort to make things right again.

For too long, our foreign policy had been a pattern of reaction to crisis, reaction to the political agendas of others, reaction to the offensive actions of those hostile to freedom and democracy. We were forever competing on territory picked by our adversaries, with the issues and timing all chosen by them. And no one knows better than combat veterans that once you're on the defensive, you can't go forward. The only movement left to you is retreat.

Some of our opinion molders had ceased to believe that we were a force for good in the world. They were ashamed that America was wealthy in a world with so much poverty. They rarely, if ever, explained that America's wealth came not from exploitation or mere good luck but from the hard work of the American people, from risk-taking by American investors, from the creativity of American inventors and entrepreneurs, and a free system of incentives.

Too many of our leaders saw the Soviets as a mirror image of themselves. If we would simply disarm, the Soviets would do likewise. They spent all their time viewing the world the way they wished it was, not the way it really is. And that's no way to protect the peace.

Their approach ignored the central focus of politics—the minds, hearts, sympathies, fears, hopes, and aspirations not of governments, but of people. The 20th century has witnessed—and America has led the way in—the rising participation of all the people in international politics. Yet, even in this age of mass communications, too many of our leaders ignored this critical dimension.

Too many of our policymakers had lost touch with changing world realities. They failed to realize that to be an effective force for peace today, America must successfully appeal to the sympathies of the world's people—the global electorate. We can't simply be anti-this, and anti-that. We can't simply react defensively to the political proposals of others, sometimes criticizing them, sometimes accommodating them, without positive alternative solutions to basic human problems.

At bottom, they ignored our responsibility to work for constructive change, not simply to try to preserve the status quo.

Fortunately, the American people sensed this dangerous drift and by 1980, a national reawakening was underway. A reawakening that resulted in a new sense of responsibility, a new sense of confidence in America and the universal principles and ideals on which our free system is based.

It is not an arrogant demand that others adopt our ways. It's a realistic belief in the relative and proven success of the American experiment. What we see in America today, in spite of the many economic hardships we're facing, is a renewed faith in the rightness of our system. That system has never failed us. We have failed the system every time we forgot the fundamental principles upon which it was based.

For America to play its proper role in the world, we had to set our own house in order. Our first and highest priority was to restore a sound economic base here at home. We had to put an end to the inflationary spiral which had been scourging this country for years, creating misery among those who have to survive on fixed incomes, destroying long-term capital markets, and mortgaging the future of our children and grandchildren. Then we had to lay the foundation for a recovery which would be based on sustainable growth without unleashing the inflationary monster again on ourselves and the world.

Well, we've achieved our first economic goal and we're well embarked on the second. Inflation, which was in double digits in 1979 and 1980, was only 3.9 percent in 1982 and in the last quarter was down to an annualized rate of only 1.1 percent.

The other essential precondition of a strengthened and purposeful foreign policy was the rebuilding of our foundation of our military strength. "To be prepared for war," George Washington said, "is the most effectual means of preserving peace." Well, it's precisely because we're committed to peace that we have a moral obligation to ensure America's defense credibility.

Now, I realize that many, well-meaning people deplore the expenditure of huge sums of money for military purposes at a time of economic hardship. Similar voices were heard in the 1930's, when economic conditions were far worse than anything we're experiencing today. But the result of heeding those voices then was a disastrous military imbalance that tempted the forces of tyranny and evil and plunged the world into a ruinous war. Possibly some of you remember drilling with wooden guns and doing maneuvers with cardboard tanks. We must never repeat that experience. (Applause)

Now, for two decades, the Soviet Union has been engaged in building up the most powerful military forces in all man's history. During this period, the United States limited its own military spending to the point that our investment in defense actually declined in real terms while Soviet investment was nearly double our own during the decade of the 1970's. Neither our limiting or cancelling of important weapon systems nor the efforts of a decade's worth of arms control agreements and negotiations have stopped or even slowed the Soviet leadership's pursuit of global military superiority.

Well, 2 years ago, we began the long, tough job of rebuilding America's defenses after those years of systematic underfunding and neglect. And today we're on the verge of putting in place a defense program adequate to our security needs. If we show the resolve to sustain the necessary levels of military spending, and with your support and that of millions of other concerned citizens, we can, we can restore [balance] and deterrence, and we can better protect the peace.

Now, let me address our foreign policy strategy. Some people have said we don't have one. (Laughter) One of the first things this administration did was what we believed the American people had demanded of us—namely, to be realistic about the nature of the world and our adversaries, and to speak the unadulterated truth about them. Making excuses for bad behavior only encourages bullies and invites aggression.

Pursuing a policy of honesty and realism toward the Soviets doesn't mean that productive relations between our two nations are impossible. What is required for such relations is restraint and reciprocity. Restraint must be demonstrated not only by words but by deeds. We respect international law and the independence of other peoples. The Soviets need only respond in kind.

Fortunately, America is far from alone in its quest for a peaceful, prosperous, and humane international order. With us stand our friends and allies, in particular the democracies of Europe, of Latin America, Asia, and the Pacific. With us in spirit also are millions of people in Poland and other Soviet-dominated countries, as well as in the Soviet empire itself. I received a snapshot the other day that had been smuggled out of Poland.

And I was so proud. It was smuggled out just for the purpose of delivering it to me. It was a picture, a little photograph snapshot of a tiny little girl and a small boy holding a cardboard sign on which was printed things in Polish, and they sent the translation. It said, "Our father is sitting in prison for Solidarity." And the look of sorrow, of pathos on the little girl's face was the most touching thing you can imagine.

Maintenance of our allied partnerships is a key to our foreign policy. The bedrock of European security remains the NATO alliance. NATO is not just a military alliance. It's a voluntary political community of free men and women based on shared principles and a common history. The ties that bind us to our European Allies are not the brittle ties of expediency or the weighty shackles of compulsion. They resemble what Abraham Lincoln called the "mystic chords of memory" uniting peoples who share a common vision. So, let there be no doubt on either side of the Atlantic. The freedom and independence of America's Allies remain as dear to us as our own.

The Soviets' fundamental foreign policy is to break the link that binds us to our NATO Allies. Their growing nuclear threat to Europe, especially since the mid-seventies, has a political as well as a military purpose, the deliberate fostering of a sense of insecurity among the peoples of Western Europe, and pressure for accommodation to the Soviet power.

The ultimate Soviet goal in Europe is to force the nations to accommodate themselves to Soviet interests on Soviet terms. We should all know just what those terms are. We need look no further than the Berlin Wall and the Iron Curtain. The truth is something that we and our NATO Allies must not hesitate to use to counter the slurs and threats made against us. Speaking the truth was one of the primary missions accomplished by Vice President Bush in his recent European trip. He cleared the air of misinformation, indeed, of deliberate falsehoods. He reaffirmed America's fundamental commitment to peace. We are not in the business of imperialism, aggression, or conquest. We threaten no one. Soviet leaders know full well there is no political constituency in the United States or anywhere in the West for aggressive military action against them.

Vice President Bush reaffirmed our commitment to serious, mutual, and verifiable arms reductions. Our proposal is a serious one. And it represents real arms reduction, not merely the ratification of existing levels of weaponry on both sides.

The Vice President, also, conveyed my willingness to meet anytime and anywhere with Mr. Andropov to sign an agreement that would eliminate an entire class of weapons from the face of the Earth. (Applause) And that offer still stands.

Finally, he conveyed our belief that success in reducing significantly the strategic arsenals of both sides depends on continued allied unity, and a determination to face and speak the truth about the threat confronting us.

I have a deep personal commitment to achieving an arms-reduction agreement at the negotiations in Geneva on intermediate-range nuclear forces. We and our allies are in full agreement that the proposal that I have made for the complete elimination of the entire class of longer-range, land-based INF missiles remains the best and most moral outcome. We are negotiating in good faith in Geneva. And ours is not a take-it-or-leave-it proposal. Our negotiations in Geneva are premised upon sound principles, supported by all the Allies after long and careful consultation.

These principles include the only basis on which a fair agreement can be reached—is that of equality of rights and limits between the United States and the Soviet Union. As a corollary, British and French strategic systems are, by definition, not a part of these bilateral negotiations and, therefore, not to be considered in them.

In addition, Soviet proposals which had the effect of shifting the threat from Europe to Asia cannot be considered reasonable. And finally, as in all areas of arms control, it will be essential that an INF agreement be underwritten by effective measures for verification. (Applause)

Now, we view these negotiations as offering the best hope of assuring peace and stability through the reduction of INF systems. Toward that end, Ambassador Nitze has been instructed to explore in Geneva every proposed solution consistent with the principles to which the alliance subscribes.

Any discussion of alliances, friends and concerns of the United States must give special attention to Asia. The U.S.-Japanese relationship remains the centerpiece of our Asian policy. Together, the United States and Japan can make an enormous contribution to the economic dynamism and technological progress needed for economic growth and development throughout the world. In Asia, itself, we continue to strengthen our partnership in support of peace. Prime Minister Nakasone and I affirmed our commitment to this partnership during his recent visit to Washington. Secretary Shultz' visit to Tokyo underscored it.

Our relationship with the People's Republic of China is another important one, not only for stability and peace in Asia, but around the globe. During his visit to Beijing, Secretary Shultz and [had?]—many hours of frank and useful discussions with Chinese leaders. The most important thing to emerge from these talks was that, despite our differences, it is clear that both sides value this relationship and are committed to improve it.

As we rebuild our relationship with China, we will not forget our other friends in the area. We are committed to maintaining our relationship with the people of Taiwan, with whom we have had a long and honorable association. (Applause) Our ties with the Republic of Korea remain strong, as troops of our two nations jointly protect that divided land against threatened aggression from the north. Incidentally, I must say, Secretary Shultz went up to the dividing line—the demilitarized zone—and met with our troops up there, some of whom were just going out on patrol for the night in that zone. And he came back with such glowing stories of the morale and the esprit de corps of our men there. And I've heard the same from the European theatre. We need have no concern about the will and determination of our sons around the world who are representing—(applause)—I wonder if I could take a second—I didn't intend to do this and I've told it to some other people before. But it's a letter I received from one of our Ambassadors in Europe. He had been up in the East German frontier visiting the Second Armored Cavalry Regiment. And he spoke glowingly of them. But in his letter he said that when he went to his helicopter, he was followed by a 19-year-old trooper who asked him if he thought he could get a message to me. Being an Ambassador, he allowed as how he could. (Laughter) The kid stood there and then said, "Mr. Ambassador, will you tell the President, we're proud to be here and we ain't scared of nothing?" (Laughter, applause)

In Southeast Asia, the Association of Southeast Asian Nations, ASEAN, as it's called, is cooperating to improve the economic, cultural, and educational growth of that region. Our country has strong mutual ties with ASEAN and its individual members. And the ANZUS Pact with Australia and New Zealand is one of the most significant relationships we have in the world today.

But in many of the important regions of the world, active conflicts take innocent lives, stunt economic growth, and block social progress. The United States has a unique ability and responsibility to work for peace in these regions.

In the Middle East, we're working to convince the peoples of the area that lasting peace and security can only come through direct negotiations, not the use of armed force. A secure and lasting peace for Israel and its Arab neighbors, including a resolution of the Palestinian problem that satisfies that people's legitimate rights, is a fundamental objective of our foreign policy.

We've launched a new initiative designed to accelerate and broaden the negotiation process begun at Camp David. That process fulfilled the principle of exchanging occupied territory for peace between Israel and Egypt. Today, I repeat my call to the Arab world to accept the reality of Israel, the reality that peace and justice are to be gained only through direct negotiation. King Hussein should be supported in his effort to bring together a joint Jordanian-Palestinian team to negotiate the future of the West Bank, Gaza, and Jerusalem.

We also continue to work for the total withdrawal of all foreign forces from Lebanon so that country can once again be an independent sovereign state. We call on Syria, the PLO, and Israel to withdraw their forces from Lebanon in the shortest possible time. A continued occupation of Lebanon by these forces can only serve the interests of those who wish to undermine the cause of peace.

This administration is prepared to take all necessary measures to guarantee the security of Israel's northern borders in the aftermath of complete withdrawal of the Israeli Army. But peace can only evolve through freely negotiated agreements, not solutions imposed by force.

The world is going through a period of great economic instability, one that poses significant dangers to world security. We and our allies must demonstrate the political courage to cooperate in undertaking the necessary remedies, particularly when these remedies require near-term sacrifices. Never has it been more true that we will all hang separately if we do not hang together.

A key element of our relationship with countries around the world is the economic link that unites us with trading partners. I will not go into great detail today about the international economic and trade policies; but one point I want to make is that it is and will be our policy to oppose protectionism at home and abro d and to foster the continued pattern of ever freer trade which has served the world so well. And it must also be fair trade. (Applause)

Closely related to the trade and economic component of our foreign policy is our relationship with the developing world. I'm convinced that the time has come for this country and others to address the problems of the developing nations in a more forthright and less patronizing way. The fact is that massive infusions of foreign aid have proven not only ineffective in stimulating economic development in the Third World, in many cases they've actually been counterproductive. That kind of foreign aid is nothing more than welfare payments on a global scale and is just as ineffectual and degrading. Our economic assistance must be carefully targeted and must make maximum use of the energy and efforts of the private sector. This philosophy is reflected in the Caribbean Basin Initiative I announced a year ago. Its goal is to combine trade, aid, and incentives for investment into a balanced arrangement that encourages self-help for the people of the Caribbean Basin. Again and again, leaders of these countries have told me that they don't want a hand-out, only help to improve their own lives by their own efforts.

An important part of such help is exposure to the effective management practices and economic thinking that contribute so much to successful development in the advanced economies like our own. There is no more damaging misconception than the notion that capitalism is an economic system benefiting only the rich. Economic freedom is the world's mightiest engine for abundance and social justice. In our own country it has created more wealth and distributed it more widely among our people than in any other society known to man. Developing countries need to be encouraged to experiment with the growing variety of arrangements for profit sharing and expanded capital ownership that can bring economic betterment to their people.

Of course, economic problems are not the only ones that developing countries must contend with. The volatile combination of poverty with social and political instability makes many of these countries national[4] targets for subversion by the new colonialism of the totalitarian left. When countries must divert their scarce resources from economic development in order to fight imported terrorism or guerrilla warfare, economic progress is hard to come by. Security assistance, therefore, is an integral part of our aid policy with respect to Latin America and the developing world in general.

We face a special threat in Central America where our own national security is at risk. Central America is too close to us, and our strategic stake in the Caribbean sea lanes and the Panama Canal is too great for us to ignore reality. The spectre of Marxist-Leninist controlled governments in Central America with ideological and political loyalties to Cuba and the Soviet Union poses a direct challenge to which we must respond. Poverty together with social and political instability make a volatile combination which the new colonialists of the totalitarian left are trying to exploit for their own cynical purposes.

The reaffirmation of democracy in Costa Rica in their elections of last year, the transition from military rule to elected civilian government in Honduras, and the launching of democracy in El Salvador with the successful elections last March prove that we're on the right course.

Thanks to this progress, Marxist revolution is no longer seen as the inevitable future of Central America. Democracy, with free elections, free labor unions, freedom of religion, and respect for the integrity of the individual is the clear choice of the overwhelming majority of Central Americans.

But economic reform needs time to work, and democracy must be nurtured in countries where it doesn't have long traditions. We must ensure that the Governments of El Salvador and other Central American countries can defend themselves against the Marxist guerrillas and (who) receive guns, training, and money through Cuba and Nicaragua. The United States cannot and will not allow Marxist terrorism and subversion to prevail in Central America. (Applause)

At the same time, we will continue, through our own efforts and through supporting efforts by other democracies of Latin America, to explore all possibilities for reconciliation and peace in Central America. But let me make it plain—there we will never abandon our friends and we will never abandon our conviction that legitimate political power can be gained through competition at the ballot box in free, open, and orderly elections. (Applause)

Ambassador Kirkpatrick, on her recent trip to Latin America, engaged in extensive consultations with leaders of the region and assured them that we would pursue our common efforts to foster economic development, assist with security concerns, and strengthen the forces of freedom.

Last June, when I addressed the British Parliament, I outlined the all-embracing goal of our foreign policy.[5] I observed that Americans have a positive vision of the future, of the world—a realistic and idealistic vision. We want to see a world that lives in peace and freedom under the consent of the governed. So far, however, we and the other democracies haven't done a very good job of explaining democracy and free economy to emerging nations.

Some people argue that any attempt to do that represents interference in the affairs of others—an attempt to impose our way of life. It's nothing of the kind. Every nation has the right to determine its own destiny. But to deny that [the] democratic values and that they have any relevance to the developing world today, or to the millions of people who are oppressed by Communist domination, is to reject the universal significance of the basic timeless credo that all men are created equal—and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights.

People living today in Africa, in Latin America, in Central Asia, possess the same inalienable right to choose their own governors and decide their own destiny as we do. By wedding the timeless truths and values Americans have always cherished to the realities of today's world, we have forged the beginnings of a fundamentally new direction in American foreign policy—a policy based on the unashamed, unapologetic explaining of our own priceless free institutions and proof that they work and describing the social and economic progress they so uniquely foster.

History is not a darkening path twisting inevitably toward tyranny, as the forces of totalitarianism would have us believe. Indeed, the one clear pattern in world events—a pattern that has grown with each passing year of this century—is in the opposite direction. It is the growing determination of men and women of all races and conditions to gain control of their own destinies and to free themselves from arbitrary domination. More than any other single force, this is the driving aspiration that unites the human family today—the burning desire to live unhindered in a world that respects the rights of individuals and nations. Now, I'll admit we're wrong when we have to put barbed wire up to keep our people from leaving this country.

Nothing makes me prouder of the country that I serve than the fact that, once again, America leads the vanguard of this movement. So, let's turn off and tune out on those voices which for too long would have us cringing under the weight of a guilt complex.

It is America that has proposed the elimination of an entire class of nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth, that has called for a 50-percent reduction in intercontinental strategic missiles. It is America that has helped end the siege of Beirut and is effectively working to broaden the Middle East peace process. It is America that works closely with the American frontline—or the African frontline states, I should say—and our European Allies for peace in Southern Africa, and that worked tirelessly with both Britain and Argentina to seek a peaceful resolution of the conflict in the South Atlantic.

[5] For text of the President's address before the British Parliament, see American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1982, pp. 14–20.

It is America that encourages the trend toward democracy in Latin America and elsewhere in the world, and cooperates with the Muslim countries and all those who want an end to the brutal Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. It is America that joins with other free peoples in calling for reconciliation and an end to oppression in Poland.

And, yes, it is America that leads the world in contributions to humanitarian and refugee programs, and to assistance programs to help the less fortunate nations of the world.

Isn't it time for us to reaffirm an undeniable truth that America remains the greatest force for peace anywhere in the world today. (Applause) For all the stress and strain of recent ordeals, the United States is still a young nation, a nation that draws renewed strength not only from its material abundance and economic might, but from free ideals that are as vibrant today as they were more than two centuries ago when that small but gallant band we call our Founding Fathers pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to win freedom and independence.

My fellow Legionnaires, the American dream lives—not only in the hearts and minds or our own countrymen, but in the hearts and minds of millions of the world's people in both free and oppressed societies who look to us for leadership. As long as that dream lives, as long as we continue to defend it, America has a future. And all mankind has reason to hope. (Applause)

Thank you. And God bless you all. (Applause)

Address by the Deputy Secretary of State (Dam) Before the American Society of International Law, April 15, 1983 [6]

Extraterritoriality, Conflicts of Jurisdiction, and U.S. Foreign Policy

On December 13, 1981, the regime of General Jaruzelski imposed martial law in Poland. The Solidarity labor union was suppressed, its leaders interned. A ruling Military Council began mass arrests and set up detention camps. President Reagan denounced the Polish regime for "trampl[ing] [7] underfoot its solemn commitments to the U.N. Charter and the Helsinki accords." He denounced the Soviet Union for its threats and pressures which bore a major share of the blame for the repression in Poland. On December 29, he unveiled a series of economic sanctions against the Soviet and Polish Governments. The steps included the suspension of licenses for the export or reexport to the Soviet Union of equipment and technology for transmission and refining of petroleum and natural gas. On June 18, 1982, the sanctions were further extended to prohibit any such exports by U.S. subsidiaries or licensees abroad.

There followed, through the rest of 1982, a major dispute between the United States and its most important allies over the effect and legality of the sanctions we had imposed. The usually dry and esoteric issues of international law suddenly became dramatic issues of political conflict, grand strategy, and global diplomacy. International law, instead of mitigating conflict, became a battleground, until the underlying dispute was eased by diplomacy.

The legal dispute was over what is sometimes called extraterritoriality. I prefer the term "conflicts of jurisdiction," which describes the issue more neutrally and analytically. In a wide variety of situations the United States and other countries attempt to apply their laws or regulations to conduct or property beyond their national boundaries. The resulting international disputes can become particularly serious when the legal arguments embody major disagreements over foreign policy, as in the Polish sanctions case. Thus conflicts of jurisdiction are at the intersection of law and diplomacy, making the topic especially appropriate for a Deputy Secretary of State to discuss before this learned Society.

One of the aims of the American Society of International Law has been "to promote the establishment and maintenance of international relations on the basis of law and justice." That is a good statement of one of our principal national objectives in both international law and foreign policy.

Let me give you a brief survey of the conflicts problem, and then I shall outline the program of concrete steps that the U.S. Government is taking to show its willingness to resolve, or ease, the kinds of difficulties that have arisen.

The international problem of conflicts of jurisdiction has an ancient history.

The concept of extraterritoriality antedated the nation-state as we now know it. Through Roman and medieval times, a citizen was subject to the jurisdiction of his sovereign wherever he traveled. More recently, for centuries, consuls of some powerful states were able to exercise criminal and civil jurisdiction over their nationals in foreign countries. As early as the 15th century, Venetians traveling in the Ottoman Empire gained exemption from Ottoman jurisdiction. Soon Sardinians, Tuscans, Austrians, Russians, and others carved out similar privileges in Ottoman domains. The other most famous case is China in the 19th century. Many European colonial powers gained the right to apply their own laws to their nationals in China through diplomatic or consular courts.

The United States engaged in the practice as well. We gained extraterritorial rights in regions of the Ottoman Empire by the 1830 Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Turkey. These rights lasted until 1949. In China, the United States obtained extraterritorial jurisdiction through the 1844 Treaty of Peace, Amity and Commerce, and did not terminate it until 1943.

When the treaty to relinquish extraterritorial rights in China was before the U.S. Senate in 1943, the Foreign Relations Committee's report somewhat nostalgically observed that the practice of extraterritoriality had had a benign purpose. It had been intended, the Committee said, "to diminish friction, minimize causes of conflict, and contribute to the maintenance of conditions of law and order." As we now know, the practice had the opposite effect. The Chinese today view it as a symbol of the humiliations imposed on them by the colonial powers during the period of their national weakness. The issue had quite literally revolutionary implications. In this modern age of nationalism, every nation is extraordinarily sensitive to other countries' assertions of jurisdiction that seem to impinge on the sacred domain of national sovereignty.

The irony is that the modern world also generates its own, almost unavoidable conditions of jurisdictional conflict. We live in a world of increasing economic interdependence. The rapidly growing scale of international trade and investment in the postwar period has brought with it a vast expansion of law, regulation, and legal complexity. The result is that even among the closest allies, claims of jurisdiction are bound frequently to collide. Consider the enormous expansion of world trade: The decade of the 1970's was a period of oil shocks and recessions; nevertheless, between 1970 and 1980 world exports increased from $328 billion to over $2 trillion. American exports alone increased from $43 billion to over $220 billion. Foreign direct investment in the United States increased almost fivefold.

In this modern environment of commercial expansion and interaction, the United States and other nations often judge that their civil and criminal law must reach conduct abroad that has substantial and direct effects on their economies, their interests, and their citizens. Needless to say, one nation's assessment of its legal necessity often runs up against another nation's conception of its national sovereignty.

Problems of conflicting jurisdiction can take many forms. Some conflicts arise from relatively routine applications of domestic law and regulation which do not mesh with other countries' practice. Other conflicts arise from basic clashes of national policy—deeply held convictions, expressed in either domestic or foreign policy, which conflict with the views of other countries.

Let me discuss both kinds of cases.

In all our countries, expanding bodies of statutory and regulatory law may impel governments or courts to attempt to reach beyond the confines of the national territory.

Our Internal Revenue Service, for example, may seek documents in the possession of an enterprise in a foreign country in order to enforce the proper allocation of taxable income among affiliated companies. Our Securities and Exchange Commission may seek the identity of Swiss bank depositors suspected of insider trading in U.S. securities markets. Our courts may attempt to serve process overseas or to attach sanctions to the failure of foreign witnesses to testify. Our laws prohibiting compliance with foreign economic boycotts against friendly countries apply—by statute—to overseas subsidiaries of American companies.

We in the United States have a long domestic experience with the differing laws of 50 States. Perhaps for that reason we seem to be more comfortable with multiple claims of jurisdiction and much less deferential to the idea of absolute territorial sovereignty. But the United States is not alone in applying its law to foreign entities or transactions. The Commission of the European Communities is now developing a series of regulations which would affect the operations of transnational corporations. One such regulation—the so-called Vredeling proposal—would require subsidiaries in the EC to disclose to their local employees certain decisions and actions of the corporate parent abroad, which have direct effects on those employees. This regulation would apply, for example, to investment and plant closing decisions.

In another area, the European Commission's antitrust authorities are considering remedies in a proceeding against IBM that would require IBM to disclose what it considers trade secrets. Both the Vredeling and the IBM developments have a large potential impact on American firms and their operations outside the EC. The U.S. Government is watching them closely. Some, of course, may savor the prospect of American discomfiture at other countries' attempts to exert an extraterritorial reach. The larger lesson, however, is that the conditions impelling countries to move in this direction are universal, powerful, and troublesome for all countries.

Perhaps the classic modern case of conflicts of jurisdiction is antitrust law. The United Kingdom, Australia, and some other important friendly countries simply do not accept the "effects test" as a legitimate basis of jurisdiction to regulate economic conduct under international law. The effects test was initially enunciated in Judge Learned Hand's 1945 Alcoa decision and is the first step in the jurisdictional analysis performed by Federal courts today. It applies U.S. antitrust law to conduct abroad having substantial, direct, and foreseeable effects on U.S. domestic or foreign commerce.

The United States is not alone in its adherence to the effects test. In the Philip Morris case, the Federal Republic of Germany has claimed jurisdiction over a multinational merger on the basis of even indirect effects on the West German market. The EC Commission has claimed jurisdiction to investigate alleged conspiratorial conduct in the wood-pulp industry—conduct occurring outside the EC—on the basis of effects within the EC. But ironically this growing parallelism only increases the inherent potential for conflict; raising the prospect of proliferating challenges to multinational enterprises by both the United States and the European Community.

Particularly acute conflicts have arisen from private treble-damage cases brought against foreign companies in American courts. The treble-damage remedy was designed in American law to bring about more effective antitrust enforcement, encouraging "private attorneys-general" by use of a financial incentive. Our public enforcement authorities—the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission—can balance a broad range of public interests when they make enforcement decisions (though foreign governments may still be unhappy with the outcome). Private parties in antitrust litigation have no such responsibility. They may even have an incentive to maximize the detrimental effect on our foreign relations in order to promote a favorable settlement. This has led some foreign governments to criticize private treble-damage actions as "rogue elephants."

The problem of conflicts of jurisdiction is heightened where there is a conflict of substantive doctrine as well as competing procedural claims. Indeed, antitrust law provides several examples of significant disputes over broad public and international policy.

With only limited exceptions, U.S. law and policy reflect our belief that the marketplace should decide what price to set for goods and services and which competitors will survive the cycles of economic fortune. As the Supreme Court said in the Brown Shoe and Brunswick cases, antitrust regulation of the marketplace is meant "to protect competition, not competitors." By contrast, many of our trading partners favor—indeed, often encourage—the creation of cartels, particularly for export of products and natural resources. These differing views over the role of the marketplace were manifested in the Swiss Watchmakers case. The Swiss Government, starting at least in 1951, authorized and encouraged the formation of a watch export cartel involving both Swiss and U.S. companies. In 1962, the U.S. Department of Justice challenged the cartel under the Sherman Act because it had anticompetitive effects in the U.S. market. The U.S. District Court subsequently entered a consent decree barring the challenged conduct. The Swiss Watchmakers case demonstrates that where an activity has an impact on two or more jurisdictions, conflict will arise if they are pursuing contrary policies. And the mechanical application of the principle of territoriality will not either satisfactorily or permanently resolve that conflict. In American law, antitrust doctrine remains not a matter of ordinary regulation but a national policy so important that the Supreme Court, in the Topco case, termed it the "Magna Carta of free enterprise."

These differing conceptions of the international order bring us to the realm of foreign policy, where some of the most dramatic cases of conflicts of jurisdiction have occurred.

The United States has resorted to economic controls in several instances as an instrument of foreign or national security policy. In the case of our export controls over trade with Communist countries, there have been many instances of disagreements with our trading partners. In a famous example in the mid-1960's, French President de Gaulle reopened trade relations with China at a time when U.S.–China relations were still locked in bitter hostility. This action quickly found its way into court.

In 1965, the United States attempted to prevent the French subsidiary of Fruehauf, an American manufacturer of tractor-trailers, from selling trailers to China. The company sought relief from a French court, which took over operation of the subsidiary and appointed a receiver who required delivery of the trailers to China. In the end, the territorial sovereign—in this case, France—was allowed to control the enterprise at issue. But the underlying policy conflict endured, at least until 1971, when one of the jurisdictions involved—that is, the United States—began to harmonize its China policy with that of the other.

The dispute over Polish sanctions was an even more vivid example of a legal dispute that was in its essence a dispute over policy. We and our allies condemned the Soviet-backed declaration of martial law in Poland and the suppression of human rights. To signify that "business as usual" could not continue with those who oppressed the Polish people, the President imposed economic sanctions against the Soviet and Polish Governments. These sanctions included, inter alia, controls over exports of oil and gas equipment and technology to the USSR.

The President imposed the sanctions under the Export Administration Act of 1979.[8] The Act authorizes controls over goods or technology "subject to the jurisdiction of the United States or exported by any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States," where necessary to further national security or foreign policy objectives of the United States. Where "national security" controls are involved, fewer disputes arise between the United States and its allies. Goods and technology which make a direct and significant contribution to Soviet military potential are prohibited by all allied countries. When the controls are imposed on "foreign policy" grounds, however—such as in the Polish case—different perspectives are more likely to exist.

The legal dispute with our allies over Polish sanctions focused on the American effort to reach conduct abroad and on the issue of sanctity of contracts. The sanctions announced on December 29, 1981, prohibited exports and reexports of oil and gas equipment and technology to the Soviet Union regardless of preexisting contractual obligations; the sanctions extended to goods of U.S. origin already in foreign hands. On June 18, 1982, the controls were extended to prohibit the export of wholly foreign-made goods, or the use of previously obtained U.S. technology, by foreign subsidiaries or licensees of U.S. firms. Our allies objected to the interruption of contracts already signed. They objected to the so-called "extraterritorial" reach of the sanctions. American parents of the foreign subsidiaries, such as Dresser Industries, and licensees of American technology, brought numerous administrative proceedings and lawsuits against the U.S. Department of Commerce. In response, this government took the same position that administration after administration, and Congress after Congress, have taken—namely, that the relationship between a parent and a subsidiary, or the use of American technology by a licensee, justifies the assertion of American jurisdiction when substantial American interests are involved.

But the issue was not resolved in the courts. It was settled by diplomacy. The underlying dispute was on the broader question of economic relations with the Soviet Union.

Events in Poland demonstrated that East-West trade has not had a moderating effect on Soviet behavior as some—in the United States and elsewhere in the alliance—had thought it would. The original theory of East-West trade was that the Soviet Union would be restrained in its international behavior for fear of jeopardizing its trade with the West. Quite possibly, dependence on East-West trade may have added to the inhibitions on Western responses to Soviet misconduct. It has also become clear since the late 1970's that the Soviet Union is gaining considerable benefit from access to Western high technology, both for direct military application and for upgrading the economic base which supports the Soviet military establishment. For these reasons, the United States, since at least the Ottawa summit of 1981, had questioned the wisdom of providing the Soviets with advanced equipment—and particularly with subsidized credits—to construct the natural gas pipeline from Siberia to Western Europe. Such a project would provide the Soviets with foreign exchange, enhance their technological capability, and create what we viewed as an unfortunate degree of dependence on energy trade with the Soviet Union.

The dispute over the Polish sanctions highlighted the need for a new consensus within the alliance on East-West economic relations. Our sanctions on oil and gas equipment, as you know, were lifted on November 13, 1982. On that day the President also announced that the major industrial nations of the West recognized "the necessity of conducting their relations with the USSR and Eastern Europe on the basis of a global and comprehensive policy designed to serve their common fundamental interests." As a result, a consensus was reached with our allies:

—First, not to engage in trade arrangements which contribute to the military or strategic advantage of the Soviet Union.

—Second, not to give preferential aid to the heavily militarized Soviet economy.

—And third, not to sign any new natural gas contracts with the Soviet Union, pending a new alliance study on energy alternatives.

We also agreed to strengthen existing controls on the transfer of strategic items to the USSR, and to examine whether our collective security requires new controls on certain kinds of high technology not currently controlled, including oil and gas equipment. And we agreed to work toward harmonizing our export credit policies.

There is an important lesson here, and indeed it is the main theme I want to put before you tonight. When these disputes over jurisdiction turn out to be grounded in disputes over policy, the most effective solution is a major effort to harmonize our policies. This may not make the legal disputes go away, but it will surely make them less divisive. The democratic nations have an even deeper interest in resolving these policy conflicts—not only to make lawyers' lives easier but to preserve the political unity of the Western alliance. And that alliance is, without exaggeration, the foundation of the legal, economic, and political system of the democratic West.

In the coming decades, the problem of maintaining allied cohesion over foreign policy will not necessarily become easier.

In the early years of the postwar period, American power was so preponderant within the alliance that our prescriptions very often received ready acceptance from allies weakened by the war and dependent on American economic aid and military protection. Today, our allies are strong, self-confident, and independent-minded. Unanimity will hardly be automatic. The United States still has the responsibility to state its convictions, and act on them, on matters of vital importance to free world security. Harmonizing policies will require determined effort on the part of all.

The United States is prepared to do its part in finding cooperative solutions to the problems I have discussed. We are prepared to be responsive to the concerns of others. If our allies join with us in the same spirit, much can be done.

First of all, the United States will continue to seek to resolve the policy differences that underlie many of these conflicts over jurisdiction. Thus, for example, we will work with our allies toward the goal of a new consensus on the important strategic issue of East-West trade.

Second, the United States can seek to minimize conflicts by shaping and applying appropriate guidelines to govern assertions of authority over conduct abroad where those assertions conflict with foreign law. The American Law Institute is now considering a third draft Restatement of Foreign Relations Law. The draft now gives a prominent place to the balancing of competing state interests in determining the existence of jurisdiction over foreign conduct. We in the Department of State are not altogether satisfied with making a balancing test the prerequisite to the existence of jurisdiction. As a practical matter, however, a careful weighing of the interests of the states concerned is obviously a useful procedure and a deterrent to unwarranted conflicts. We welcome the Federal courts' use of a general balancing analysis in private cases like Timberlane, Mannington Mills, and Mitsui. Balancing can certainly help to ensure that decisions affecting significant foreign concerns are not taken lightly.

Third, the United States is making clear its intention to avoid further problems of retroactive application of economic controls. We know that the reliability of contracts is essential to the health and growth of commerce. Last week the President transmitted to Congress legislation to amend and extend the Export Administration Act of 1979. The administration bill strengthens the national security export controls and their enforcement, while at the same time easing some of the problems we have had in the past over foreign policy controls:

—The bill declares explicitly that "it is the policy of the United States, when imposing new foreign policy controls, to minimize the impact on pre-existing contracts and on business activities in allied or other friendly countries to the extent consistent with the underlying purpose of the controls."

—The bill also explicitly recognizes the sanctity of contracts as a limitation which will insulate many existing contracts from disruption by new foreign policy export controls. Specifically, the bill protects existing sales contracts [that] require delivery within 270 days from the imposition of controls, unless the President determines that a prohibition of such exports is required by the "overriding national interest" of the United States.

—To strengthen enforcement of the national security export controls, the bill authorizes restrictions on future imports into the United States of goods or technology from persons abroad who violate these controls. Controls on imports into the United States by particular foreign violators are obviously territorial and therefore are clearly within our jurisdiction under international law.

Fourth, the administration is seeking other legislative changes that will indirectly, but we hope effectively, reduce the significance of conflicts of jurisdiction. The Justice Department, for example, has recently proposed amendments to the Clayton Antitrust Act to allow treble damages only in cases of per se violations. While these amendments would continue to permit treble-damage suits in cases of cartelization, they would reduce some friction concerning U.S. policy in such areas as regulation of vertical relationships, including supplier/purchaser relationships.

Fifth, the Departments of State and Justice are considering further statutory proposals to address problems arising in the international context from private treble-damage actions. I do not mean to criticize any particular past cases or to suggest any outcome for any cases now before the courts. Nevertheless, we are exploring ways of ensuring that private antitrust cases posing conflicts of jurisdiction are indeed consonant with the overall public interest. The Attorney General's actions in this area are informed by considerations of international comity and balancing. When private attorneys-general act, similar considerations should be applied.

Sixth, we are seeking to expand the practice of prior notice, consultation, and cooperation with foreign governments wherever regulatory, enforcement, or investigative actions raise a danger of conflicts. The Antitrust Division and the Federal Trade Commission have pioneered in the practice of routinely providing advance notice to other governments of their actions affecting foreign parties. Such consultation is carried out either pursuant to multilateral guidelines developed in the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) or under bilateral agreements with particular countries.

Seventh, in a related vein, we will be seeking procedures whereby regulatory, investigatory, or enforcement actions that substantially involve other countries' interests will be coordinated with the Department of State. The State Department can advise about foreign concerns, suggest procedures for notice to and consultation with foreign governments, and otherwise help agencies do their job without unnecessary collisions with other governments. We are eager to conclude agreements to expedite the exchange of investigatory information, particularly to combat tax evasion. We believe that some international disputes can be avoided or eased by this means.

In some cases, as in our relations with the Securities and Exchange Commission, this kind of arrangement is working well. In other situations, improvement is needed. We therefore will be calling on the agencies concerned to work with us and give us prior notice of actions which pose a potential problem of conflicts of jurisdiction.

These measures will not eliminate the problem of conflicts of jurisdiction. But the United States is eager to do what it can to minimize such problems in the future. We value our relations with our partners.

Any one of our countries may, on some occasion in the future, feel that its national interest or public policy cannot be served without an assertion of jurisdiction which leads to a disagreement with its partners. The complexity of the modern interdependent world, and the reality of greater equality among the major industrial nations, make these occurrences almost inevitable.

The problem is ripe for creative legal thinking. It also calls for statesmanship to ensure that the fundamental political and moral unity of the democracies is not torn by disputes over policy.

All of the industrial democracies face the same larger responsibility: How do we reconcile our sovereign independence as nations with the imperative of our unity as allies? How do we balance our interest in expanding trade and jobs and prosperity with our interest in not contributing to the growth of Soviet power?

Once again the great enterprise of the law touches upon some of the most profound questions of our national and international life.

Commencement Address by the Secretary of State (Shultz) at Stanford University, Stanford, California, June 12, 1983 [9]

The Responsibility of the Democracies

"Commencement" says that something new is about to begin, just as something else ends. Don't worry about it too much—you can still have fun in the real world. And if someone tells you it means a sharp transition from the world of learning to the world of work, don't believe it. The transition is more apparent than real.

The week before last, for example, I happened to meet with an extraordinary American, our Ambassador to the Federal Republic of Germany, Arthur Burns. He's full of information and ideas about Germany, the Atlantic alliance, the American economy, and dozens of other subjects. He's lively and well and full of the future. He's 79 years old. He has been taking German lessons over the past 18 months. He's never stopped learning.

The message is that this habit of learning is a habit that will sustain you throughout your life.

An old saw has it that experience itself is the best teacher. I can mention this now that you have already paid your Stanford tuition. But the old saw is only a half-truth. Just as scientists say that luck is something that comes to the prepared, experience teaches only those capable of grasping its meaning. So, make use of the gifts Stanford has given you: the habits of careful observation, of an analytical ordering of what you see, of living with ambiguity and waiting for the evidence before reaching conclusions—the quality of mind that enables you truly to learn from experience.

Societies too must learn and remember, if they are to maintain their vitality and confront the future.

In recent weeks, much of my time has been devoted to this country's relations with our closest friends and allies, the great democratic nations of the Atlantic Community and Japan. A month ago, I attended a meeting in Paris of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), the descendant of the international agency that, 35 years ago, administered the Marshall Plan. Two weeks ago, I joined President Reagan in Williamsburg at the economic summit with leaders of our major industrial partners. And this past Thursday and Friday, in Paris, I took part in the semi-annual meeting of Foreign Ministers of the North Atlantic alliance.

As Dean Acheson said about the alliance, this unity "is not an improvisation. It is a statement of the facts and lessons of history."

When the Atlantic alliance was founded in 1949, the allies showed they had learned a lesson from the period before World War II—when the democracies had lacked the will to come together in the face of danger, when they had tried to evade their responsibility of maintaining their strength and permitted a dangerous imbalance of power to develop. Eventually they were forced to respond, but it was at a cost of millions of lives that might have been spared had they taken bold but prudent action beforehand. When the Atlantic alliance was formed, the purpose was to prevent war by ensuring that the cohesion, strength, and collective will of the democracies would never again be doubted by any adversary.

The alliance has succeeded in preventing war. Indeed, since its formation, the only use of military force on the Continent of Europe has been by the Soviet Union against its own "allies." But experience has also taught that the unity of the free nations is central to the achievement of any of our goals: peace, freedom, security, prosperity.

I want to say a few words now about how the democracies, learning from the "facts and lessons of history," are responding today to a new set of challenges—in the realms of political affairs, economics, and security.

The first lesson is that what the democracies have in common is of overriding importance to us and to others throughout the world. Our common heritage gives us a common responsibility.

American students graduating today have many worries, I am sure. You must be anxious about your careers and your future. Yet there is one category of worries that I daresay you do not have. You are not concerned that the threat of imprisonment or torture hangs over you if you say or write or do the "wrong" thing. You have no fear of the policeman's midnight knock on the door. Considering how few democracies there are in this world, what we have in common with our allies is therefore something precious: systems of constitutional, representative government; systems of law that guarantee basic political and civil rights and freedoms; open economic systems that give free rein to individual talent and initiative.

Most alliances in history have not lasted. The fact that the democracies have been held together by ties of political, economic, and security cooperation for more than three decades, through many profound changes in international conditions, is proof, I believe, that our unity of shared values and common purpose is something special. At the same time, the grim lesson of history should warn us that even this great coalition will not survive without conscious effort and political commitment. Those statesmen who were "present at the creation" in the immediate postwar period showed enormous vision and courage. In a new era in history, it is up to all of us to summon the same vision and courage to assure that it survives and flourishes.

Therefore it is of enormous importance that our moral unity is today being so effectively translated into political unity. It is important that old divisions within the alliance are narrowing, as shown by the fact that the Ministerial meeting I just attended was held in Paris for the first time in 17 years. It is important that the alliance is attractive enough for new countries to want to join—the original 12 now number 16. It is important that the 24 industrial democracies grouped in the OECD have worked out a framework for a consensus on the difficult issue of East–West trade, based on a thoughtful analysis of the balance of interests in economic relations with Communist systems.

Outside of the formal alliance framework, British, French, and Italian soldiers now stand alongside our Marines protecting Beirut. Our Atlantic allies, Japan, and other countries around the world are supporting our efforts to promote the withdrawal of all external forces from Lebanon. Britain, France, West Germany, Canada, and the United States are working together as a "contact group" to help reach a negotiated arrangement for the independence of Namibia. And all the diverse Williamsburg summit partners—including Japan—joined in an impressive joint statement on security and arms control.

Thus, for all our occasional squabbles, the democratic nations have not forgotten the paramount importance of the values and interests we have in common.

In the economic dimension as well, experience teaches that cooperation is essential. We now live in an interdependent world in which each country's well-being, primarily its own responsibility, is nevertheless affected powerfully by the health of the global economy, for which the industrial democracies bear a special responsibility.

In the 1970's, the plagues of recession, oil shocks, and inflation spread across national boundaries. The impact was not only economic but political. There was great concern that these ills would weaken not only Western economies but the cohesion of Western societies. If democratic governments proved unable to deal effectively with their economic problems, societies would be under continuing strain, social divisions would be aggravated, and we might have faced a demoralizing crisis of democracy. Increasing resort to protectionism, choking off world trade and compounding the recession, could have undermined relations between allies. These political divisions, as well as budgetary pressures, threatened to weaken the common defense.

The free nations had learned, however, from the experience of the 1930's, when the failure of cooperation gave birth to widespread protectionism, which deepened the Great Depression. This time the free nations began the practice of holding yearly economic summits and intensified their cooperation in many other forums, multilateral and bilateral.

As the Williamsburg Declaration testifies: "The recession has put our societies through a severe test, but they have proved resilient." Rather than economic stagnation, we are seeing the impressive capacity of open economies to regain their vitality. Growth with low inflation has resumed in the United States, Japan, West Germany, Britain, and other countries which together account for about three-quarters of the production of the industrialized world. If we have truly wrung inflation out of our system, and if we all maintain discipline in our national policies, the world could be headed for a long period of sustained noninflationary growth. Those are big "ifs," I know, but our experience should tell us that the job can be done and that we will be much better off as we do it.

It is essential that we resist protectionism, which could hinder this recovery. The Williamsburg summit partners candidly acknowledged to each other that every country's record is spotty on this score. But they committed themselves "to halt protectionism, and as recovery proceeds to reverse it by dismantling trade barriers." New efforts of trade liberalization would be especially beneficial to the developing countries: In 1980, their export earnings of $580 billion amounted to 17 times their net receipts from foreign aid.

For all our temporary setbacks, the free economies have brought about since 1945 an era of growth and prosperity unprecedented in history. On the Eastern side of the divided continent of Europe, economic problems are systemic. Inefficiencies are built-in; innovation is inhibited; effective economic reforms are excluded because they would weaken the grip of centralized Soviet political control. In contrast, our economic difficulties are largely problems of self-discipline, of better management of fiscal and monetary policy to permit the inherent vitality of the free economic system to show its power. The weakness of Soviet-style economies is structural. We have reason for confidence, for our economic future is in our own hands.

Unfortunately, the Soviet system is very proficient in another sphere: the accumulation of military power. Therefore, security must remain a priority area of cooperation.

If the values and interests we have in common are truly precious to us, then we have a duty to defend them.

The summit partners at Williamsburg made very clear that they have learned this lesson. Let me read to you from their joint declaration:

> "As leaders of our seven countries, it is our first duty to defend the freedom and justice on which our democracies are based. To this end, we shall maintain sufficient military strength to deter any attack, to counter any threat and to ensure the peace. . . . The security of our countries is indivisible and must be approached on a global basis. . . . We have a vision of a world in which the shadow of war has been lifted from all mankind, and we are determined to pursue that vision." [10]

In an age of nuclear weapons, maintaining collective security is no easy task. "A nuclear war cannot be won, and must never be fought." That's a quote from Ronald Reagan. Our challenge is really twofold: We must both defend freedom and preserve the peace. We must seek to advance those moral values to which this nation and its allies are deeply committed. And we must do so in a nuclear age in which a global war would thoroughly destroy those values. As the President pointed out in Los Angeles on March 31, our task is "one of the most complex moral challenges ever faced by any generation."

We and our allies have agreed for decades on a twofold strategy for meeting this challenge. First, we are committed to ensuring the military balance, modernizing our forces, and maintaining vigilance. Second, we are prepared for and committed to constructive dialog with our adversaries, to address the sources of tension, resolve political conflicts, and reduce the burden and danger of armaments.

We cannot find security in arms alone. We are willing to negotiate differences—but we cannot do so effectively if we are weak, or if the Soviet Union believes it can achieve its objectives without any compromise. Therefore, both these tracks—strength and diplomacy—are essential.

Unfortunately, the democratic nations have tended to neglect their defense responsibilities. Some serious problems have resulted and are now coming home to roost. They underlie many of the current controversies. In the 1970's, the trauma of Vietnam caused the United States to reduce its armed forces and reduce real defense spending, at the same time that the Soviet Union, in the wake of the Cuban missile crisis, was embarked on a relentless buildup in all categories of military power, strategic, conventional, and naval. Once the United States lost its unquestioned strategic superiority over the Soviet Union, NATO's defense—which relies on the commitment of American strategic power—became much more complicated. Yet NATO conventional forces continue to be inadequate. Ironically, NATO's success in keeping the peace in Europe for more than three decades leads some to take peace for granted and to forget the crucial role NATO has played in guaranteeing it.

The unprecedented expansion of Soviet power over the past two decades cannot be ignored or rationalized away. Any President, any administration, would be forced to respond. We have seen too often that an imbalance of power is an invitation to conflict. Therefore this administration, and our allies, are committed to maintenance of the military balance, in Europe and globally. Surely the burden of proof is on those who would undo the present military balance, or alter it, or conduct risky experiments with unilateral concessions without genuinely reducing the levels of armaments on both sides.

At the same time, experience teaches that a balance of power, though necessary, is not sufficient. Our strength is a means to an end; it is the secure foundation for our effort to build a safer, more peaceful, and more hopeful world. On the basis of strength, the cohesion of our alliances, and a clear view of our own objectives, we must never be afraid to negotiate.

This is our attitude to arms control. As NATO decided in December 1979, for example, we intend to modernize our intermediate-range nuclear forces in Europe to counter the Soviet deployment of over 1,000 nuclear warheads on their new intermediate-range missiles (SS–20's).[11] But we are also willing to eliminate this entire category of nuclear weapons from the face of the Earth; and we are prepared, as an interim step, to reduce these forces to any equal, verifiable level.

If negotiations do not succeed, however, we must be prepared to deploy at the end of this year as decided in 1979. The Soviet Union has no higher-priority goal at the moment than to intimidate NATO into cancelling its deployments unilaterally, thereby leaving the Soviet Union with its massive monopoly of new missiles and warheads already in place. As the summit partners made unanimously clear at Williamsburg, the alliance cannot, and will not, permit this to happen.

At Williamsburg and at NATO, we saw an impressive consensus on security and arms control. This is a firm ground for confidence that war will be deterred, that stability will be maintained, and that we will have a chance at least to reach reliable agreements making the world that you inherit a safer place.

The final lesson I want to leave you with is this: Experience teaches us that nothing is foreordained. Nations, like individuals, have choices to make. History is filled with many examples of nations and individuals that made the wrong choices; there are also many examples of foresight, wisdom, and courage.

Democracies are sometimes slow to awaken to their challenges. But once they are aroused, no force on Earth is more powerful than free peoples working together with clear purpose and determination.

Therefore, I have confidence in the future. You new graduates, with your energy, talent, and creativity, represent the promise of that future. Few others are so fortunate. Few others have such a responsibility.

And now, my congratulations to you, to your parents, and to Stanford, and my very best wishes to all of you.

[11] The decision to modernize NATO's long-range theater nuclear forces was announced in a communiqué issued at a special meeting of NATO Defense Ministers in Brussels on December 12, 1979. For text, see American Foreign Policy: Basic Documents, 1977–1980, pp. 494–496.

Address by President Reagan Before the 38th Session of the U.N. General Assembly, September 26, 1983[12]

The U.N. Charter and the U.S. Commitment to Peace

Mr. Secretary-General, Mr. President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen of the world.

Thank you for granting me the honor of speaking today, on this first day of general debate in the 38th Session of the General Assembly. Once again I come before this body preoccupied with peace. Last year I stood in this chamber to address the Special Session on Disarmament.[13] I have come today to renew my nation's commitment to peace. And I have come to discuss how we can keep faith with the dreams that created this organization.

The United Nations was founded in the aftermath of World War II to protect future generations from the scourge of war, to promote political self-determination and global prosperity, and to strengthen the bonds of civility among nations. Founders sought to replace a world at war with a world of civilized order. They hoped that a world of relentless conflict would give way to a new era, one where freedom from violence prevailed.

Whatever challenges the world was bound to face, the founders intended this body to stand for certain values, even if they could not be enforced, and to condemn violence, even if it could not be stopped. This body was to speak with the voice of moral authority. That was to be its greatest power.

But the awful truth is that the use of violence for political gain has become more, not less, widespread in the last decade. Events of recent weeks have presented new, unwelcome evidence of brutal disregard for life and truth. They have offered unwanted testimony on how divided and dangerous our world is, how quick the recourse to violence.

What has happened to the dreams of the U.N.'s founders?

What has happened to the spirit which created the United Nations?

The answer is clear: Governments got in the way of the dreams of the people. Dreams became issues of East versus West. Hopes became political rhetoric. Progress became a search for power and domination. Somewhere the truth was lost that people don't make wars, governments do.

And today in Asia, Africa, Latin America, the Middle East, and the North Pacific, the weapons of war shatter the security of the peoples who live there, endanger the peace of neighbors and create ever more arenas of confrontation between the great powers. During the past year alone, violent conflicts have occurred in the hills around Beirut, the deserts of Chad and the Western Sahara, in the mountains of El Salvador, the streets of Suriname, the cities and countryside of Afghanistan, the borders of Kampuchea, and the battlefields of Iran and Iraq.

We cannot count on the instinct for survival to protect us against war; despite all the wasted lives and hopes that war produces, it has remained a regular, if horribly costly, means by which nations have sought to settle their disputes or advance their goals.

And the progress in weapons technology has far outstripped the progress toward peace. In modern times, a new, more terrifying element has entered into the calculations—nuclear weapons. A nuclear war cannot be won and it must never be fought. I believe that if governments are determined to deter and prevent war, there will not be war. Nothing is more in keeping with the spirit of the U.N. Charter than arms control.

When I spoke before the Second Special Session on Disarmament, I affirmed the United States Government's commitment, and my personal commitment, to reduce nuclear arms, and to negotiate in good faith toward that end.

Today, I reaffirm those commitments. The United States has already reduced the number of its nuclear weapons worldwide and, while replacement of older weapons is unavoidable, we wish to negotiate arms reductions, and to achieve significant, equitable, verifiable arms control agreements. And let me add, we must ensure that world security is not undermined by the further spread of nuclear weapons. Nuclear nonproliferation must not be the forgotten element of the world's arms control agenda.

At the time of my last visit here, I expressed hope that a whole class of weapons systems—the longer-range INF, intermediate [-range] nuclear forces—could be banned from the face of the Earth. I believe that to relieve the deep concern of peoples in both Europe and Asia, the time was ripe, for the first time in history, to resolve a security threat exclusively through arms control. I still believe the elimination of these weapons—the zero option—is the best, fairest, most practical solution to the problem. Unfortunately, the Soviet Union declined to accept the total elimination of this class of weapons.

When I was here last, I hoped that the critical strategic arms reduction talks would focus, and urgently so, on those systems that carry the greatest risk of nuclear war—the fast-flying, accurate, intercontinental ballistic missiles which pose a first strike potential. I also hoped the negotiations could reduce by one-half the number of strategic missiles on each side and reduce their warheads by one-third. Again, I was disappointed when the Soviets declined to consider such deep cuts, and refused as well to concentrate on these most dangerous destabilizing weapons.

Despite the rebuffs, the United States has not abandoned and will not abandon the search for meaningful arms control agreements. Last June, I proposed a new approach for the START negotiations.[14] We did not alter our objective of substantial reductions, but we recognized that there are a variety of ways to achieve this end. During the last round of Geneva talks, we presented a draft treaty which responded to a number of concerns raised by the Soviet Union. We will continue to build upon this initiative.

Similarly, in our negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear forces, when the Soviet leaders adamantly refused to consider the total elimination of these weapons, the United States made a new offer. We proposed, as an interim solution, some equal number on both sides between one and—zero and 572. We recommended the lowest possible level.

Once again, the Soviets refused an equitable solution and proposed instead what might be called a "half-zero option"—zero for us, and many hundreds of warheads for them. That is where things stand today, but I still haven't given up hope that the Soviet Union will enter into serious negotiations.

We are determined to spare no effort to achieve a sound, equitable, and verifiable agreement. And for this reason, I have given new instructions to Ambassador Nitze in Geneva, telling him to put forward a package of steps designed to advance the negotiations as rapidly as possible. These initiatives build on the interim framework the United States advanced last March, and address concerns that the Soviets have raised at the bargaining table in the past. Specifically:

First, the United States proposes a new initiative on global limits. If the Soviet Union agrees to reductions and limits on a global basis, the United States for its part will not offset the entire Soviet global missile deployment through U.S. deployments in Europe. We would, of course, retain the right to deploy missiles elsewhere.

Second, the United States is prepared to be more flexible on the content of the current talks. The United States will consider mutually acceptable ways to address the Soviet desire that an agreement should limit aircraft as well as missiles.

Third, the United States will address the mix of missiles that would result from reductions. In the context of reductions to equal levels, we are prepared to reduce the number of Pershing II ballistic missiles as well as ground-launched cruise missiles.

I have decided to put forward these important initiatives after full and extensive consultations with our allies, including personal correspondence I've had with the leaders of the NATO governments and Japan and frequent meetings of the NATO Special Consultative Group. I have also stayed in close touch with other concerned friends and allies. The door to an agreement is open. It is time for the Soviet Union to walk through it.

I want to make an unequivocal pledge to those gathered today in this world arena. The United States seeks and will accept any equitable, verifiable agreement that stabilizes forces at lower levels than currently exist. We're ready to be flexible in our approach, indeed, willing to compromise. We cannot, however, especially in light of recent events, compromise on the necessity of effective verification.

Reactions to the Korean airliner tragedy are a timely reminder of just how different the Soviets' concept of truth and international cooperation is from that of the rest of the world. Evidence abounds that we cannot simply assume that agreements negotiated with the Soviet Union will be fulfilled. We negotiated the Helsinki Final Act, but the promised freedoms have not been provided, and those in the Soviet Union who sought to monitor their fulfillment languish in prison. We negotiated a Biological Weapons Convention, but deadly yellow rain and other toxic agents fall on Hmong villages and Afghan encampments. We have negotiated arms agreements, but the high level of Soviet encoding hides the information needed for their verification. A newly discovered radar facility and a new ICBM raise serious concerns about Soviet compliance with agreements already negotiated.

Peace cannot be served by pseudo arms control. We need reliable, reciprocal reductions. I call upon the Soviet Union today to reduce the tensions it has heaped on the world in the past few weeks and to show a firm commitment to peace by coming to the bargaining table with a new understanding of its obligations. I urge it to match our flexibility. If the Soviets sit down at the bargaining table seeking genuine arms reductions, there will be arms reductions. The governments of the West and their people will not be diverted by misinformation and threats. The time has come for the Soviet Union to show proof that it wants arms control in reality, not just in rhetoric.

Meaningful arms control agreements between the United States and the Soviet Union would make our world less dangerous; so would a number of confidence-building steps we've already proposed to the Soviet Union.

Arms control requires a spirit beyond narrow national interests. This spirit is a basic pillar on which the United Nations was founded. We seek a return to this spirit. A fundamental step would be a true nonalignment of the United Nations. This would signal a return to the true values of the Charter, including the principle of universality. The members of the United Nations must be aligned on the side of justice rather than injustice, peace rather than aggression, human dignity rather than subjugation. Any other alignment is beneath the purpose of this great body and destructive of the harmony that it seeks. What harms the Charter harms peace.

The founders of the United States [United Nations] expected that member nations would behave and vote as individuals, after they had weighed the merits of an issue—rather like a great, global town meeting. The emergence of blocs and the polarization of the United Nations undermine all that this organization initially valued.

We must remember that the nonaligned movement was founded to counter the development of blocs and to promote détente between them. Its founders spoke of the right of smaller countries not to become involved in others' disagreements. Since then, membership in the nonaligned movement has grown dramatically, but not all the new members have shared the founders' commitment of genuine nonalignment. Indeed, client governments of the Soviet Union, who have long since lost their independence, have flocked into the nonaligned movement, and once inside have worked against its true purpose. Pseudo nonalignment is no better than pseudo arms control.

The United States rejects as false and misleading the view of the world as divided between the empires of the East and West. We reject it on factual grounds. The United States does not head any bloc of subservient nations, nor do we desire to. What is called the West is a free alliance of governments, most of whom are democratic and all of whom greatly value their independence. What is called the East is an empire directed from the center which is Moscow.

The United States, today, as in the past, is a champion of freedom and self-determination for all people. We welcome diversity; we support the right of all nations to define and pursue their national goals. We respect their decisions and their sovereignty, asking only that they respect the decisions and sovereignty of others. Just look at the world over the last 30 years, and then decide for yourself whether the United States or the Soviet Union has pursued an expansionist policy.

Today, the United States contributes to peace by supporting collective efforts by the international community. We give our unwavering support to the peacekeeping efforts of this body, as well as other multilateral peacekeeping efforts around the world. The United Nations has a proud history of promoting conciliation and helping keep the peace. Today, U.N. peacekeeping forces or observers are present in Cyprus and Kashmir, on the Golan Heights and in Lebanon.

In addition to our encouragement of international diplomacy, the United States recognizes its responsibilities to use its own influence for peace. From the days when Theodore Roosevelt mediated the Russo-Japanese War in 1905, we have a long and honorable tradition of mediating or dampening conflicts and promoting peaceful solutions. In Lebanon, we, along with France, Italy, and the United Kingdom, have worked for a cease-fire, for the withdrawal of all external forces, and for restoration of Lebanon's sovereignty and territorial integrity. In Chad, we have joined others in supporting the recognized government in the face of external aggression. In Central America, as in southern Africa, we are seeking to discourage reliance upon force and to construct a framework for peaceful negotiations. We support a policy to disengage the major powers from Third World conflict.

The U.N. Charter gives an important role to regional organizations in the search for peace. The U.S. efforts in the cause of peace are only one expression of a spirit that also animates others in the world community. The Organization of American States was a pioneer in regional security efforts. In Central America, the members of the Contadora group are striving to lay a foundation for peaceful resolution of that region's problems. In East Asia, the Asian countries have built a framework for peaceful political and economic cooperation that has greatly strengthened the prospects for lasting peace in their region. In Africa, organizations such as the Economic Community of West African States are being forged to provide practical structures in the struggle to realize Africa's potential.

From the beginning, our hope for the United Nations has been that it will reflect the international community at its best. The United Nations at its best can help us transcend fear and violence and can act as an enormous force for peace and prosperity. Working together, we can combat international lawlessness and promote human dignity.

If the governments represented in this chamber want peace as genuinely as their peoples do, we shall find it. We can do so by reasserting the moral authority of the United Nations. In recent weeks, the moral outrage of the world seems to have reawakened.

Out of the billions of people who inhabit this planet, why, some might ask, should the death of several hundred shake the world so profoundly? Why should the death of a mother flying toward a reunion with her family or the death of a scholar heading toward new pursuits of knowledge matter so deeply? Why are nations who lost no citizens in the tragedy so angry?

The reason rests on our assumptions about civilized life and the search for peace. The confidence that allows a mother or a scholar to travel to Asia or Africa or Europe or anywhere else on this planet may be only a small victory in humanity's struggle for peace. Yet what is peace if not the sum of such small victories?

Each stride for peace and every small victory are important for the journey toward a larger and lasting peace. We have made progress. We've avoided another world war. We've seen an end to the traditional colonial era and the birth of a hundred newly sovereign nations. Even though development remains a formidable challenge, we've witnessed remarkable economic growth among the industrialized and the developing nations. The United Nations and its affiliates have made important contributions to the quality of life on this planet, such as directly saving countless lives through its refugee and emergency relief programs. These broad achievements, however, have been overshadowed by the problems that weigh so heavily upon us. The problems are old, but it is not too late to commit ourselves to a new beginning, a beginning fresh with the ideals of the U.N. Charter.

Today, at the beginning of this 38th Session, I solomnly pledge my nation to upholding the original ideals of the United Nations. Our goals are those that guide this very body. Our ends are the same as those of the U.N.'s founders, who sought to replace a world at war with one where the rule of law would prevail, where human rights were honored, where development would blossom, where conflict would give way to freedom from violence.

In 1956, President Dwight Eisenhower made an observation on weaponry and deterrence in a letter to a publisher. He wrote: "When we get to the point, as we one day will, that both sides know that in any outbreak of general hostilities, regardless of the element of surprise, destruction will be both reciprocal and complete, possibly we will have sense enough to meet at the conference table with the understanding that the era of armaments has ended and the human race must conform its actions to this truth or die." He went on to say, ". . . we have already come to a point where safety cannot be assumed by arms alone . . . their usefulness becomes concentrated more and more in their characteristics as deterrents than in instruments with which to obtain victory. . . ."[15]

Distinguished ladies and gentlemen, as we persevere in the search for a more secure world, we must do everything we can to let diplomacy triumph. Diplomacy, the most honorable of professions, can bring the most blessed of gifts, the gift of peace. If we succeed, the world will find an excitement and accomplishment in peace beyond that which could ever be imagined through violence and war.

I want to leave you today with a message I've often spoken about to the citizens of my own country, especially in times when I felt they were discouraged and unsure. I say it to you with as much hope and heart as I've said it to my own people. You have the right to dream great dreams. You have the right to seek a better world for your people. And all of us have the responsibility to work for that better world. And, as caring, peaceful peoples, think what a powerful force for good we could be. Distinguished delegates, let us regain the dream the United Nations once dreamed. Thank you.

Chapter 2. The Organization and Conduct of American Foreign Policy

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Secretary of State (Dam) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, July 28, 1983 [1]

The Legislative Veto

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee.

I appreciate the opportunity to appear before the Committee this afternoon.

The Supreme Court has now decided, in INS v. Chadha and two related cases, [2] that the legislative veto is unconstitutional. The Department of State and this Committee both recognize that the Court's historic decision affects a considerable body of legislation in the field of foreign affairs and national security. My principal theme here today is that our two branches of government have a common interest in devising cooperative ways to fulfill our shared responsibilities. We owe the American people a constructive response to the issues we now face.

The Department of State is in the process of reviewing all the legislation with which we deal and which is affected by Chadha—the language of the statutes, their legislative history, and the record of executive-legislative relations in working with these statutes.

We have reached some tentative conclusions, which I am happy to share with the Committee. Our review is still continuing, however, and we will keep the Committee informed as we proceed toward firmer judgments.

In The Federalist No. 47, James Madison referred to the separation of powers as "this essential precaution in favor of liberty." The genius of our constitutional system is that a structure of dispersed powers and checks and balances, designed to limit government power and preserve our freedom, has also been able to produce coherent and effective national policy. This success is a tribute to the Founding Fathers who built the structure; it is also a tribute to the generations of leaders and statesmen since then who have put the nation's well-being first and foremost as they played their constitutional roles in the various branches of government. As Justice White acknowledged in his dissent in Chadha, "the history of the separation of powers doctrine is also a history of accommodation and practicality."

The administration is prepared to work with the Congress in this spirit.

First, I would like to review with you the history of the legislative veto—what it is, how it has worked—and then the Chadha decision itself and its consequences.

Finally, I shall discuss the impact of that decision on some of the statutes that are of particular concern to the Department of State and to this Committee.

"Legislative veto" is a term describing a variety of statutory devices that were meant to give the Congress legal control over actions of executive departments and agencies by means other than the enactment of laws. Legislative veto provisions have been included in statutes for more than 50 years. The procedure was first passed into law in the Act of June 30, 1932, [3] which authorized President Hoover to reorganize the structure of the Federal Government subject to congressional review. The device was added to various statutes during World War II, when the Congress delegated greater authority to the President in the area of foreign affairs and national security, subject to the legislative veto procedure. Enactment of the procedure became frequent again in the 1960's and 1970's, as Congress sought to strengthen its oversight over the expanding practice of rulemaking by administrative agencies. Adoption of the legislative veto procedure reached its zenith in the early 1970's, in connection with some major controversies in the area of foreign affairs and national security.

Some of these statutes provide for congressional disapproval of proposed administrative regulations. Some involve review of decisions of individual cases (Chadha, for example, involved the suspension of the deportation of a single person), or review of other executive actions under authority granted by statute. Other legislation, such as the War Powers Resolution, [4] involves the allocation of broad constitutional powers.

The legislative vetoes in all these statutes fall into two general categories. First, there are those in which the full Congress, or one House or one committee, is purportedly given a right to "veto" an administrative action. A typical statute of this kind requires the President to report an action or rule to both Houses of Congress. The executive action may not be made or take effect until after a fixed period (60 days, for example). If Congress does not act during the period, the executive action can take effect, but if the Congress disapproves (or one House or committee, as the statute may provide), it does not take effect. Second, there are statutory schemes by which an administrative action purportedly becomes valid only when approved by Congress. The typical statute of this kind requires the President to report a proposed action and then provides for affirmative approval by one or two Houses of the Congress. Most legislative vetoes, like the one in Chadha, fall within the first category.

The case of INS v. Chadha involved a section of the Immigration and Nationality Act. [5] That statute permitted the Attorney General to allow a deportable alien to remain in the United States, suspending an otherwise valid deportation order. This suspension authority, however, was subject to disapproval by a simple resolution of either House of Congress. The Attorney General suspended Mr. Chadha's deportation, but the House of Representatives disapproved. Chadha brought suit; the Supreme Court held the congressional veto to be unconstitutional. The rationale of the Court's holding was that legislative actions, to be valid, must follow the course prescribed in the Constitution: approval by both Houses and "presentment" to the President. Thus the Court's decision in Chadha invalidates not only the "one-House veto" but the "two-House veto" and "committee veto" as well, a point confirmed by the Court's subsequent summary decisions of July 6. Those statutes which provide for congressional action by joint resolution—passed by both Houses and signed by the President—would not seem to be affected by Chadha.

The legislative veto has long been controversial, ever since Woodrow Wilson first vetoed a bill incorporating a legislative veto in 1920.

Since then, most administrations have considered the device unconstitutional, while the Congress has tended to favor it as another useful check on executive authority. This specific controversy is now decided. Yet paradoxically, the practice of executive-legislative relations is unlikely to undergo any radical change in the wake of Chadha, for several reasons.

For one thing, Chadha does not affect other statutory procedures by which the Congress is informed of or involved in actions by the executive branch. Specifically, the Court's decision does not affect statutory requirements for notifications, certifications, findings or reports to Congress, consultations with Congress, or waiting periods which give Congress an opportunity to act before executive actions take effect. In the foreign affairs field, moreover, the executive branch and the Congress have generally reconciled or disposed of controversies and differences without resort to the process of legislative veto. Therefore, we see no reason why the Court's decision need cause a fundamental change in our relationship.

The administration is prepared to work closely with the Congress to resolve any questions or problems that may arise as a result of the Chadha decision. And we hope that Congress will act in the same spirit of cooperation.

Perhaps the key legal question raised by Chadha is that of "severability." The problem is an intriguing one: Since the legislative veto provision of a statute is unconstitutional, is any of the rest of the law tainted by that defect?

The Supreme Court has given us a basis for answering that question. The general principle is that the provision containing the legislative veto will be found to be severable, and the remainder of the statute will continue unaffected, unless it is evident that the Congress would not have enacted the remainder of the law without the legislative veto. That test establishes a strong presumption in favor of severability.

The Court has also given us some additional guidelines. There is a further presumption of severability, first of all, if the statute contains an express "severability clause." Several of the statutes with which we deal—including the War Powers Resolution and the Atomic Energy Act, [6] for example—contain such severability clauses. Second, the legislative veto is also presumed to be severable if the legislative program in question is "fully operative as a law" without the veto provision. In the statutes with which we are dealing, this seems generally to be the case. These statutes often establish a system under which the executive branch is empowered to make or implement a decision 30 or 60 days later unless the Congress chooses to intervene.

In foreign affairs cases to date, in the absence of formal congressional action, the executive determination has proceeded, although congressional views have always been taken fully into account. This pattern clearly indicates that these statutes are capable of independent operation with no further congressional action.

There are more than a dozen statutes in the foreign affairs and national security area that are affected by the Chadha decision. I would say that four statutes or groups of statutes are of particular importance. These are arms export controls, the War Powers Resolution, nuclear nonproliferation controls, and trade controls related to emigration. Let me discuss these in turn.

Arms Export Control.—First, arms export controls. I know this subject is of pressing concern to this Committee. It is also of importance to the administration, because of the importance of such transactions to the security of friendly countries and to our political relations with friendly countries.

Under the Chadha decision, we believe that the procedures for legislative vetoes in several sections of the Arms Export Control Act [7] are not valid, but that the reporting and waiting periods remain. The Court decision in no way alters the elaborate structure of reporting, consultation, and collaboration that the executive branch and the Congress have worked out over recent years to ensure effective congressional oversight.

Under the Arms Export Control Act, for example, we have regularly and formally notified the Congress of proposed sales under the Foreign Military Sales program and of proposed licenses of arms exports sold through commercial channels. We also provide the Congress with additional advance notification of many of those transactions. As a matter of practice and accommodation, we have agreed to provide the Congress with informal pre-notifications of proposed sales under the FMS program before the final notice is submitted. This procedure, which is not in the statute, has given Congress the opportunity to review and comment upon proposed transactions informally and privately before the executive branch makes a formal public commitment.

In addition, under the Javits amendment, [8] we submit an annual Arms Sales Proposal covering all FMS sales and commercial exports above certain thresholds which are considered eligible for approval during the current calendar year, as well as an indication of which ones are most likely to result in a letter of offer or an export license. We also provide, under Section 28 of the Act, quarterly reports of each "price and availability" estimate provided to a foreign country, together with a list of requests received from a foreign country for a letter of offer to sell defense articles and services.

Thus, the Congress has received and will continue to receive annual, quarterly, and case-by-case information, formal and informal, on all actual and potential arms sales. In the last 3 years we have sent up more than 240 formal reports of intended arms sales—110 in fiscal year 1981, 90 in fiscal year 1982, and 41 in fiscal year 1983 to date. In addition, three informal notifications are currently before you. While Congress has never disapproved any proposed arms sale, the administration has on occasion modified the terms of a proposal in light of congressional concerns. We have done so even though the executive branch has long considered the legislative veto to be unconstitutional.

I think the record speaks for itself. The executive branch does not live in a vacuum, and we are acutely aware of the need for consultation and cooperation in this sensitive area of arms exports. Our foreign policy and national interest require that a President, any President, be able to use this important policy instrument effectively, flexibly, and, I might add, responsibly. We recognize the necessity of congressional oversight. As in any other important area of national policy, both Congress and the Executive have a heavy responsibility to work together in the national interest.

War Powers Resolution.—Next, the War Powers Resolution. The War Powers Resolution contains four major operative parts. The first of these is a consultation requirement. In Section 3 of the Resolution, the President is required to consult with the Congress "in every possible instance" before United States armed forces are introduced into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in such hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances. And the President is to consult regularly while the forces remain in such situations.

The second operative part is a reporting requirement. In Section 4(a) of the resolution, the President is required to make a formal report to Congress in any case in which United States armed forces are introduced—

> "(1) into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances;
> "(2) into the territory, airspace or waters of a foreign nation, while equipped for combat, except for deployments which relate solely to supply, replacement, repair, or training of such forces; or
> "(3) in numbers which substantially enlarge United States Armed Forces equipped for combat already located in a foreign nation. . . ."

The third operative part, Section 5(b), requires the President to withdraw U.S. troops not later than 60 days after a report of actual or imminent involvement in hostilities unless the Congress has affirmatively authorized their continued presence.

The fourth operative part is a legislative veto. According to Section 5(c), the President must withdraw U.S. troops introduced into hostilities even before the end of 60 days if the Congress so directs by concurrent resolution.

The first and second provisions of the War Powers Resolution, on consultation and reporting, are in our view unaffected by the Chadha decision. We do not intend to change our practice with respect to consultation and reporting.

The fourth provision, which asserted a right of Congress by concurrent resolution to order the President to remove troops engaged in hostilities, is clearly unconstitutional under the Supreme Court's holding in Chadha. It must be said, however, that this holding is unlikely to have a significant impact on the way national security policy is conducted. In the decade since the enactment of the War Powers Resolution, no U.S. forces have been committed to long-term hostilities. It is doubtful that Presidents have refrained from such commitments simply because of the legislative veto in the War Powers Resolution; it is equally doubtful that Presidents will now feel freer of restraints because of Chadha. The lesson of recent history is that a President cannot sustain a major military involvement without congressional and public support.

The legislative veto provision of the War Powers Resolution is severable from the others, in our view, according to the Supreme Court's test and guidelines. The resolution itself includes a severability clause, and the other operative portions of the resolution need not be affected by the dropping of the veto provision.

The third operative part of the resolution, requiring positive congressional authorization after 60 days, does not fall within the scope of Chadha. Its constitutionality is neither affirmed, denied, nor even considered in the Chadha decision. As you know, the executive branch has traditionally had questions about this requirement of congressional authorization for Presidential disposition of our armed forces, both in light of the President's Commander-in-Chief power and on practical grounds. Congress, of course, has had a different view. I do not believe that any purpose would be served by debating these questions here, in the abstract. This provision is unlikely to be tested in the near future. Here, too, I want to reaffirm the administration's strong commitment to the principles of consultation and reporting, confident that in a spirit of cooperation the Executive and the Congress can meet future challenges together in the national interest.

Nuclear Non-Proliferation.—Nuclear nonproliferation is another important policy area in which statutes have contained legislative veto provisions. Various sections of the Atomic Energy Act, for example, have provided for a legislative veto of Presidential determinations to permit nuclear exports to foreign countries.

These statutory arrangements typically involve three elements. First, they establish very strict standards limiting the export of nuclear items. Second, they authorize the President to waive certain restrictions and permit exports if he makes certain findings. Third, they have provided for a congressional veto of the Presidential waiver. We consider that those standards and that waiver authority, as well as the statutory requirement of notification to Congress and the observance of a waiting period, continue to be valid. We will continue to wait through the period during which the Congress, in the past, deliberated over its veto; during that time, the Congress may use its constitutional authority to enact new legislation if it chooses. The only provision that is invalid is the third, which permitted a legislative veto by concurrent resolution.

The administration and the Congress share the same concern about nuclear proliferation. We have been active diplomatically in this field, as this Committee well knows. We vigorously oppose the development of nuclear weapons capabilities by additional countries. Each executive branch agency is required to keep the Congress, including this Committee, fully informed of its activities in this field and of significant developments abroad. We have done so, and we are proud of our record of close consultation and collaboration with the Congress. We will continue that practice.

Jackson–Vanik Amendment [9] and Trade-Related Issues.—A fourth important statutory area involving a legislative veto is the procedure for granting most-favored-nation treatment (MFN) to certain nonmarket countries. Under the Jackson–Vanik amendment, nondiscriminatory tariff treatment may be granted to these countries only when they comply with certain conditions affecting the right of emigration. These requirements may be waived on the basis of stated findings and determinations by the President.

The annual report required under that statute—for continuation of MFN for Hungary, Romania, and China—is now before the Congress. This report illustrates how we believe Congress and the Executive should continue to work together constructively.

We presented that report to the Congress before the Supreme Court decision was announced, but we would have done precisely the same thing if the Chadha decision had been handed down before the report was filed. We regard the report as fully effective to extend the waiver authority and to continue the waivers currently in force. At the same time, legislative oversight hearings serve the salutary purpose of scrutinizing the implementation of statutory requirements, of airing public concerns, and of making our nation's deep commitment to human rights known to other nations.

The spirit with which we expect to work with Congress in the future, in all statutory fields, is illustrated by another example. We are required by the Case–Zablocki Act [10] to report executive agreements to the Congress, and we do so regularly. That procedure notifies the Congress of agreements already signed. There is also a procedure for enabling this Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee to consult with us as to the form of significant international agreements prior to their conclusion. This practice was arranged between the Department of State and the Chairman of the two Committees in 1978. It is not required by law, but makes good sense. We will maintain it.

As I have emphasized, little of practical significance need in fact change as a result of the Supreme Court decision. The Department of State is committed to continue working closely with the members and committees of Congress and to take their concerns into account in reaching decisions on issues of policy. If anything, I believe Chadha will make the departments and agencies of the executive branch more, not less, conscious that they are accountable for their actions.

There are many basic questions about these separation of powers which the Supreme Court will probably never settle. In that realm our constitutional law is determined, in a sense, as in Britain—by constitutional practice, by political realities, by the fundamental good sense and public conscience of the American people and their representatives. This is how we have always settled these questions, and this is how we, the Executive and the Congress, must approach these problems in the aftermath of Chadha.

Our Constitution has proved to be a wise and enduring blueprint for free government. In this period of our history, our Nation faces challenges that the drafters of that document could not have imagined. The Federal Government has the duty to conduct this Nation's foreign policy and ensure its security in a nuclear age, in an era of instantaneous communications, in a complex modern world in which international politics has become truly global. America's responsibility as a world leader imposes on us a special obligation of coherence, vision, and constancy in the conduct of our foreign relations. For this there must be unity in our national government. The President and the Congress must work in harmony, or our people will not have the effective, strong, and purposeful foreign policy which they expect and deserve.

We have seen in the last 15 years that when Congress and the President are at loggerheads, the result can be stalemate and sometimes serious harm to our foreign policy.

We now have an opportunity, all of us, to put much of that past behind us, and to start afresh. We have a chance to shape a new era of harmony between the branches of our government—an era of constructive and fruitful policymaking, of creativity and statesmanship. That is President Reagan's goal and the goal of all of us in his administration.

Thank you.

Address by President Reagan Before a Joint Session of Congress, January 25, 1983 (Extract) [1]

State of the Union

But let us turn briefly to the international arena. America's leadership in the world came to us because of our own strength and because of the values which guide us as a society, free elections, a free press, freedom of religious choice, free trade unions, and above all, freedom for the individual and rejection of the arbitrary power of the state.

These values are the bedrock of our strength. They unite us in a stewardship of peace and freedom with our allies and friends in NATO, in Asia, in Latin America, and elsewhere. They are also the values which in the recent past some among us had begun to doubt and view with a cynical eye.

Fortunately, we and our allies have rediscovered the strength of our common democratic values. And we are applying them as a cornerstone of a comprehensive strategy for peace with freedom. In London last year, I announced the commitment of the United States to developing the infrastructure of democracy throughout the world. [2] We intend to pursue this democratic initiative vigorously. The future belongs, not to governments and ideologies which oppress their peoples, but to democratic systems of self-government which encourage individual initiative and guarantee personal freedom. (Applause)

But our strategy for peace with freedom must also be based on strength, economic strength and military strength. A strong American economy is essential to the well-being and security of our friends and allies. The restoration of a strong, healthy American economy has been and remains one of the central pillars of our foreign policy. The progress I have been able to report to you tonight will, I know, be as warmly welcomed by the rest of the world as it is by the American people.

We must also recognize that our own economic well-being is inextricably linked to the world economy. We export over 20 percent of our industrial production and 40 percent of our farmland produces for export. We will continue to work closely with the industrialized democracies of Europe and Japan, and with the International Monetary Fund to insure it has adequate resources to help bring the world economy back to strong, noninflationary growth.

As the leader of the West and as a country that has become great and rich because of economic freedom, America must be an unrelenting advocate of free trade. As some nations are tempted to turn to protectionism, our strategy cannot be to follow them, but to lead the way toward freer trade. To this end, in May of this year America will host an economic summit meeting in Williamsburg, Virginia.

As we begin our third year, we have put in place a defense program that redeems the neglect of the past decade. We have developed a realistic military strategy to deter threats to peace and to protect freedom if deterrence fails. Our armed forces are finally properly paid, after years of neglect are well trained and becoming better equipped and supplied. And the American uniform is once again worn with pride. (Applause) Most of the major systems needed for modernizing our defenses are already underway and we will be addressing one key system, the MX missile, in consultation with the Congress in a few months.

America's foreign policy is once again based on bipartisanship, on realism, strength, full partnership, in consultation with our allies, and constructive negotiation with potential adversaries. From the Middle East to Southern Africa to Geneva, American diplomats are taking the initiative to make peace and lower arms levels. We should be proud of our role as peacemakers.

In the Middle East last year, the United States played the major role in ending the tragic fighting in Lebanon and negotiated the withdrawal of the PLO from Beirut.

Last September, I outlined principles to carry on the peace process begun so promisingly at Camp David.[3] All the people of the Middle East should know that in the year ahead we will not flag in our efforts to build on that foundation to bring them the blessings of peace. (Applause)

In Central America and the Caribbean Basin, we are likewise engaged in a partnership for peace, prosperity and democracy. Final passage of the remaining portions of our Caribbean Basin Initiative, which passed the House last year, is one of this administration's top legislative priorities for 1983.

The security and economic assistance policies of this administration in Latin America and elsewhere are based on realism and represent a critical investment in the future of the human race. This undertaking is a joint responsibility of the executive and legislative branches. And I'm counting on the cooperation and statesmanship of the Congress to help us meet this essential foreign policy goal.

At the heart of our strategy for peace is our relationship with the Soviet Union. The past year saw a change in Soviet leadership. We're prepared for a positive change in Soviet-American relations. But the Soviet Union must show by deeds as well as words a sincere commitment to respect the rights and sovereignty of the family of nations. (Applause) Responsible members of the world community do not threaten or invade their neighbors. And they restrain their allies from aggression.

For our part, we're vigorously pursuing arms reduction negotiations with the Soviet Union. Supported by our allies, we've put forward draft agreements proposing significant weapon reductions to equal and verifiable lower levels. We insist on an equal balance of forces. And given the overwhelming evidence of Soviet's violations of international treaties concerning chemical and biological weapons, we also insist that any agreement we sign can and will be verifiable. (Applause)

In the case of intermediate-range nuclear forces, we have proposed the complete elimination of the entire class of land-based missiles. We're also prepared to carefully explore serious Soviet proposals. At the same time, let me emphasize that allied steadfastness remains a key to achieving arms reductions. (Applause)

With firmness and dedication, we'll continue to negotiate. Deep down, the Soviets must know it's in their interest as well as ours to prevent a wasteful arms race. And once they recognize our unshakeable resolve to maintain adequate deterrence, they will have every reason to join us in the search for greater security and major arms reductions. When that moment comes—and I'm confident that it will—we will have taken an important step toward a more peaceful future for all the world's people. (Applause)

fense program, let me first say how much I appreciate Congress' support for—indeed, Congress' lead—in rebuilding our defenses. It was Congress that initially set the pace for this effort by appropriating funds above President Carter's budget request for fiscal year 1981. And it is Congress that made it possible for President Reagan to restore the basic readiness of our forces as well as begin our long-term defense modernization program. I know that members of this committee in particular have long been deeply concerned about a dangerous shift in the military balance, and I think I speak for the entire Nation in thanking you for your leadership.

The budget request itself is only the final step in designing our defense program. Before we put numbers to programs, we have determined our overall national security objectives the military threats posed to those objectives, our defense strategy to deal with these military threats and, finally, the forces we require to implement that strategy.

In my testimony last year [5] I focused on the modifications that we had to make to the military strategy and defense posture that we inherited. In some cases, we found that the policies we inherited did not conform to the international realities we faced, and we had to make some changes. Today I want to discuss our entire policy from a broader outlook, considering both the reforms we have made, and the enduring principles from the past that together form the foundation of our current defense policy.

NATIONAL SECURITY OBJECTIVES

At the outset, it may be useful for us to recall that our overall national security objectives, in a very abbreviated form, are:

To deter military attack against the United States, its allies, and other friendly countries.

In the event of a conventional attack, to deny the enemy his objectives and bring a rapid end to the conflict on terms favorable to our interests.

To promote meaningful and verifiable mutual reductions in nuclear and conventional forces.

To inhibit further expansion of Soviet control and military presence.

To avoid subsidizing or supporting the Soviet buildup by preventing, in concert with our allies, the flow of militarily significant technologies and material to the Soviet Union.

THE SOVIET MILITARY THREAT

In assessing our ability to achieve these national security objectives, we recognize that the Soviet Union poses, and for the foreseeable future will continue to pose, the most formidable threat to the United States and our interests. Of course, we recognize that some threats arise independently of the Soviet Union. But, more often than not, the magnitude and persistence of these other threats and our difficulties in countering them are greatly aggravated by Soviet policies, backed by the expanding reach of Soviet military power.

The 20-year Soviet military buildup, coupled with the collective failure of the United States and our allies to make a sufficient response, has resulted in a dangerous shift in the global military balance.

This global military balance has shifted against us because the Soviet Union has outspent and outproduced us for at least a decade. Even when we include the allied efforts of each side, we find that the Warsaw Pact has outspent and outproduced the NATO countries.

[See chart 1: U.S.-Soviet Military Investment.] [6]

[6] None of the charts is reproduced. All brackets are in the source text.

READEX FICHE

As this chart reveals, total Soviet investment in future military capabilities—that is, for weapons and other equipment, construction of military facilities, and research and development—is about double ours.

[See chart 2: U.S.-Soviet Military Investment by Mission Area.]

This aggregate comparison can also be viewed in its component parts. As this chart shows, during 1980–81 Soviet investment in strategic nuclear forces was about three times higher than ours; about 50 percent higher for general purpose forces; and about twice our rate for research and development. This is in stark contrast to the situation 15 years ago.

But, more important than the "input"—what the Soviets spend on defense—is the "output"—the tanks, planes, ships, missiles, and other military hardware they produce and deploy.

[See chart 3: U.S.-Soviet Weapons Production.]

In "Soviet Military Power" we published lists of equipment produced by the Soviet Union.[7] On this chart, however, we are comparing production totals only of equipment added to the inventory of Soviet and U.S. forces to compare actual military capability. If we had used total production figures, which include export equipment, the imbalance would tip even more toward the Soviet Union.

This trend is even more worrisome when one considers that the Soviet Union has also upgraded the quality of its weapons—particularly in conventional forces. The Soviet Union has always fielded greater numbers of conventional weapons which we offset with smaller numbers of more capable equipment. But now we find that the steady growth in Soviet investment has allowed them to produce increasingly more sophisticated weapons such as the potent T–72 tank, accurate air defense weapons, and fighter aircraft capable of operating in all types of weather.

As the next chart illustrates, even though the United States is now increasing its rate of weapons production, the numbers sought for this year will fall far short of the average annual Soviet production.

In submitting this data for your consideration, I want to emphasize that it is not our intention to match the Soviets tank for tank or aircraft for aircraft. Our intention is to regain an effective deterrent against either Soviet conventional or nuclear aggression. We recognize that other factors besides quantitative comparisons affect the military balance. One of the most important of these is that the Soviets have matched their military buildup with military and political expansion into strategically important areas far from the Soviet periphery.

As this map shows, the Soviet Union now has:

Acquired security and cooperative agreements in Africa, the Near East, Southeast Asia, and Southwest Asia.

Undertaken massive arms deliveries to Third World countries—double the amount we supplied from 1977–81.

Acquired Cuban, East German, and/or Libyan military proxies in Central America and Africa.

Greatly increased its power projection capabilities.

Expanded its overflight and access rights to operating bases in key parts of the world.

Occupied Afghanistan.

The cumulative effect of the Soviet military buildup and Soviet expansionism has been not only to change the type of attack we might confront and the areas in which we could be attacked, but also to increase greatly the effectiveness of such an attack. The increased size and quality of Soviet forces has enabled them to turn from a defensive force posture to one increasingly structured for offensive use. Their increased naval and power projection capability, coupled with their acquisition of critical footholds in strategic locations throughout the world, enables them to launch and maintain conflict in several theaters simultaneously. Their buildup of nuclear forces, particularly ICBM's, enables them to threaten to destroy a very large part of our force in a first strike, while retaining overwhelming nuclear force to deter any retaliation we could carry out.

DEFENSE STRATEGY

Our defense strategy for dealing with this threat consists of a series of discrete but interrelated elements, some of which have endured for many years, others of which are more recent in origin. It incorporates three main principles:

First, our strategy is defensive. That is to say, it excludes the possibility that the United States would initiate a war or launch a preemptive strike against the forces or territories of other nations.

Second, our strategy is to deter war. The deterrent nature of our strategy is closely related to our defensive stance. We maintain a nuclear and conventional force posture designed to convince any potential adversary that the cost of aggression would be too high to justify an attack.

Third, should deterrence fail, our strategy is to restore peace on favorable terms. In responding to an enemy attack, we must defeat the attack and achieve our national objectives while limiting—to the extent possible and practicable—the scope of the conflict.

To carry out this strategy we have emphasized three vital supporting policies.

First, the United States remains part of, and contributes to, a collective defense posture that incorporates the strength of our allies. The North Atlantic Treaty, the Rio Treaty, the ANZUS Treaty, and our treaties with Korea, the Philippines, and Japan help provide for an effective common defense against external aggression.

Second, to buttress our collective security posture, we maintain forward deployments that, combined with the forces of our allies, provide the first line of conventional defense in Western Europe, Japan, and Korea. In the event of war, we would reinforce these forward-deployed units rapidly.

Third, we seek a flexible force structure that builds on our alliance commitments and forward deployments and provides us a variety of options for quickly responding to unforeseen contingencies in any region where we have vital interests to defend.

THE PROBLEMS WE INHERITED

When the Reagan administration took office, we found inconsistencies between the existing strategy and the forces available to carry out that strategy. Furthermore, that defense program held little promise of providing either the strategy or the force posture necessary to maintain deterrence in future years in light of the changing Soviet threat. Therefore, we had two simultaneous tasks to accomplish. We needed to make our forces ready to fight immediately, should conflict be forced upon us. We also needed to begin long-term improvements to our defense posture so that we would be prepared to meet threats that might arise in the future.

OUR PROGRESS TO DATE—READINESS AND PERSONNEL

In order to have our forces ready to respond to a crisis in the near term, it was necessary to improve quickly the readiness and sustainability of our existing forces. To improve force readiness we have allocated resources for adequate manning and training, maintenance, supplies of spare parts and ammunition. We have increased readiness funding consistently in fiscal year 1981, fiscal year 1982, and fiscal year 1983. To attract and retain qualified men and women in our Armed Forces we increased military pay and bonuses. Military pay was increased by $3.2 billion in fiscal year 1981, $4.5 billion in fiscal year 1982, and $1.5 billion in fiscal year 1983, for an average 11.7 percent pay raise in fiscal year 1981, 14.3 percent in fiscal year 1982, and 4 percent in fiscal year 1983.

As a result of these efforts by the administration and Congress, the readiness of our forces has already improved substantially across the board and the number of fully or substantially ready major active units has increased by almost one-third. To improve upon the gains already made, funding for readiness continues to be a high priority in the fiscal year 1984 budget.

The caliber of the men and women in uniform has also improved dramatically. During the past year all the services met or exceeded their recruiting objectives, and 86 percent of our non-prior service recruits were high school graduates, up from 68 percent in fiscal year 1980. Retention showed similar gains, with almost 70 percent of all eligible personnel choosing to reenlist in fiscal year 1982 compared to only 55 percent 2 years earlier.

This year, we have asked our military personnel to join all other recipients of Government payment in a common sacrifice by foregoing a pay raise in fiscal year 1984. By doing so they contribute, along with all other Government employees and beneficiaries, to the important national goal of reducing near-term budget deficits.

We hope that this will not cause recruiting and retention to suffer. If recruiting and retention do become adversely affected to the point that the readiness of our forces will suffer, during the coming fiscal year, we will of course recommend appropriate action to the Congress. Also, I will seek to repay the sacrifice we are asking of our military, with a substantial pay raise in the fiscal year 1985 budget—enough, I hope, to make up for this year's pay freeze. The President and I remain fully committed to fair and equitable military pay that will be competitive with pay levels in the private sector.

SUSTAINABILITY

We have also sought to improve the sustainability of our forces. The Soviet Union today has the war reserves to fight far longer than they could a decade ago. In order to ensure that the Soviets never calculate they could simply outlast us, our budget requests resources for more replacement equipment, spare parts, ammunition and other essential consumables, and for a more rapid expansion of defense production during an emergency.

MODERNIZATION

In order to provide the forces necessary to assure deterrence now, and into the future, we had to begin simultaneously a systematic modernization of both our conventional and our nuclear forces. We do not seek high technology weapons for the sake of having high technology. But, we must field weapons that are superior to the Soviets' weapons and today we see that the Soviets are fielding more and more highly sophisticated weapons which pose new threats to U.S. and allied forces. To deter, and if necessary defeat, the use of these weapons, we must ensure that we can counter with improved capabilities of our own.

CONVENTIONAL FORCE MODERNIZATION

This modernization program will provide enhanced capabilities for all components of our conventional forces—so that they can counter the increased Soviet conventional threat. To cite one example, the Soviet's Backfire bomber presents a grave threat to our maritime forces that can be countered only by sophisticated defenses. The Backfire can fly farther and faster and carry more missiles than its predecessors; and its missiles are faster and have a longer range than any we've faced in the past.

To defend against this Soviet capability, we now need better early warning from satellites and aircraft to detect these bombers earlier. And we need fighters with more accurate weapons and improved range to intercept the Backfire before it can launch its missiles. To achieve these capabilities we are upgrading our satellites, AWACS, and fighters. Because we cannot hope to destroy all the bombers before they launch their missiles, we have also developed the Aegis, a cruiser with a missile defense system which has an improved ability to detect low and high flying missiles. Its sophisticated radar and computers can track a large number of missiles and aircraft simultaneously; its air defense weapons are even capable of destroying missiles.

NUCLEAR FORCE MODERNIZATION

We must also modernize our nuclear forces in order to restore the balance with Soviet nuclear forces. Although all of our strategic forces account for only 15 percent of the defense budget, they enable us to maintain our ability to deter nuclear conflict now and in the future, and also increase the likelihood of obtaining significant, mutual arms reduction agreements with the Soviet Union. The key components of our nuclear force modernization are production of the MX missile, Trident missile and submarine, B-1 bomber, Pershing II and ground launched cruise missile, and improve strategic defense and command, control and communications capabilities.

Our nuclear modernization program is not designed to achieve superiority or a first-strike potential. We recognize that there can be no winners in a nuclear war. But this recognition on our part is not sufficient to prevent the outbreak of nuclear war; it is essential that the Soviet leadership understand this as well. If the Soviets recognize that our forces have an effective retaliatory capability—that they can and will deny the Soviets their objectives at whatever level of conflict the Soviets might try—then our deterrence is effective, and the risk of war diminished.

THE DEFENSE BUDGET

Before I conclude, I want to correct some misconceptions regarding the defense budget.

[See chart 6: Defense Cuts.]

First, the defense budget has not been sacrosanct—it too has taken its "fair share" of cuts in the Reagan administration. As this chart shows, when the Reagan 5-year defense budget was unveiled in March 1981, we planned to add $116 billion to the Carter administration budget for the same period. Now, less than 2 years later, that figure has been reduced by more than half. And we must also recall why it was necessary for the President to ask such a large increase for the 1980's. It was because our neglect of our Armed Forces in the 1970's coincided with the vast increases in the U.S.S.R. military strength described earlier.

But, the cuts we have made in the President's defense spending plan have not sacrificed readiness for modernization. Since we took office over 100 marginal weapons or equipment programs have been eliminated, reduced or merged.

Third, cutting back on defense is not the solution to this Nation's very real deficit problem. The increase in defense spending has not produced these large deficits, and a decrease in defense spending, while it could endanger American security, would not cure them.

[See chart 7: Comparing Defense and Entitlements.]

Obviously Federal spending levels affect the size of the budget deficits. It is true that total Federal spending has grown significantly over the past two decades. But, as this chart indicates, entitlement spending has skyrocketed over the past 15 years while defense spending slipped and is only now approaching its 1968 level. Even with the currently proposed increases, defense spending in fiscal year 1984 will constitute only 28 percent of the total Federal budget, in sharp contrast to the 40–50 percent share allocated to defense during the 1950's and 1960's.

Finally, I want to address those who say "I am for defense, but . . ." And those who say "I don't know anything about the defense budget, but—we must cut it to reduce the deficit, or we must cut it in fairness to other programs, or we must cut it for a myriad of other reasons."

I must emphasize to them that we simply cannot reduce defense spending any further without undermining the security of the United States. We cannot afford a situation in which legitimate and necessary defense spending becomes the "whipping boy" of those who look only at budget or deficit numbers or forget that the Soviets are driven by no such constraints. We must not forget that defense needs must be determined by the threat to our national security that we face.

We must therefore develop a responsible and balanced understanding of the real meaning of the threat we face. The detailed facts are clear enough. But there is great resistance to accept the real meaning of these facts, because to do so is to accept the need for a major sustained response. Confronted as we are by all manner of other real or apparent needs, there is a temptation to argue away even the most overwhelming evidence, with misplaced hope that we can continue as usual, putting off or canceling unpopular military necessities, and increasing our spending on more politically popular domestic programs. Instead, the regrettable fact is that, in view of the threats posed to our national security, this course is no longer open to us.

We must also recognize that the commitment to deterrence and defense is neither easy nor inexpensive. When it confronts an opposing coercive "offensive" strategy, it requires continued vigilance to maintain. When deterrence succeeds, it is easy to attribute the maintenance of peace not to the contribution of the defense that enforces the deterrent, but to a host of more facile assumptions—some imagined newfound "peaceful intent" of the opponent, the spirit of détente, growing economic interdependency, and so forth. When deterrence fails, however, and the opponent has deliberately weighed the risks and still decided to attack, the dividends of a viable defense are unquestionable. But unless such a defense is acquired, is in being, and is maintained at the ready, it is too late to try to regain it after war begins.

We simply cannot wait to restore our military strength—we must do it now, this year, in this budget. The rapid and continuous growth of Soviet offensive military power does not allow us the option of waiting until after the economy fully recovers, or waiting until an emergency develops.

The past decade of inadequate defense spending has forced us to accept "double duty." We must increase the basic readiness and sustainability of our forces to be prepared for an immediate crisis, should one occur. At the same time we must make up for lost years of investment by undertaking the research and development, and force modernization—including the modernization and strengthening of all three parts of the strategic Triad—that are needed to meet threats that are likely to arise in the future. To do one at the expense of the other or to stint on either would be to undermine the security of the United States and that, ladies and gentlemen, I, and I hope you, are not willing to do.

Address by President Reagan, February 19, 1983 [8]

Defense Spending

My fellow Americans, this Monday will mark the 251st birthday of George Washington, the father of our country. Unlike Abraham Lincoln, Franklin Roosevelt, and most other famous presidents, Washington was not a great orator or man of words. He was above all a man of action and character. His courage, firmness and integrity first led a ragged, outnumbered army to triumph against the mightiest empire of his time and then guided our infant republic to maturity as the first President of the United States.

George Washington didn't say much, but when he did speak, as both a soldier and a statesman, what he said was worth listening to. As president, in his first annual address to the Congress, he offered a wise piece of advice on defense preparedness that is as timely today as it was when he uttered it nearly two centuries ago.

"To be prepared for war," George Washington said, "is the most effectual means of preserving the peace." When I reread this quote a few days ago, it brought to mind the current public debate over this administration's efforts to protect the peace by restoring our country's neglected defenses.

Now, I know that this is a hard time to call for increased defense spending. It isn't easy to ask American families who are already making sacrifices in the recession or American businesses which are struggling to reinvest for the future. And it isn't easy for someone like me who has dedicated his entire political career to reducing government spending.

On the other hand, it's always very easy and very tempting politically to come up with arguments for neglecting defense spending in time of peace. One of the great tragedies of this century was that it was only after the balance of power was allowed to erode and a ruthless adversary, Adolf Hitler, deliberately weighed the risks and decided to strike that the importance of a strong defense was realized too late.

That was what happened in the years leading up to World War II. And especially for those of us who lived through that nightmare, it's a mistake that America and the free world must never make again.

I want you to know that members of my administration and I have agonized over the current defense budget. We've trimmed back our plans for rebuilding defense by more than half. We've hunted for savings in non-essential programs. We've weighed economic risks and economic benefits. The defense budget we finally presented is a minimal budget to protect our country's vital interests and meet our commitments.

For those who wish to cut it back further, I have a simple question. Which interests and which commitments are they ready to abandon? Let me make just a few key points about our defense program. First, we must develop a responsible and balanced understanding of the danger we face. Over the past 20 years, the Soviet Union has accumulated enormous military might while we restrained our own efforts to the point where defense spending actually declined, in real terms, over 20 percent in the decade of the '70s.

Today the Soviets out-invest us by nearly two to one even with the defense increases of the past two years. They outproduce us substantially in almost every category of weapons. And in action such as the brutal invasion and occupation of Afghanistan, they have demonstrated their willingness to use these weapons for aggression.

Finally, Soviet military power has spread around the globe, threatening our access to vital resources and our sea lines of communication, undermining our forward line of defense in Europe and Korea and challenging us even at home here in our own hemisphere.

We must face the facts. If we continue our past pattern of only rebuilding our defenses in fits and starts, we will never convince the Soviets that it's in their interests to behave with restraint and negotiate genuine arms reductions. We will also burden the American taxpayer time and again with the high cost of crash rearmament. Sooner or later, the bills fall due.

For instance, our land based missiles were designed in the 1950's and installed in the 60's. And many of the pilots of our B–52 bombers are younger than the planes they fly. The fact is these past fits and starts in a decade of neglecting our defenses have left this administration, this Congress, and the American taxpayer stuck with double duty. We had to act quickly to increase the basic readiness and staying power of our forces so that they could meet any immediate crisis if one arose. At the same time, we have to make up for lost years of investment by undertaking the research and development and the force modernization needed to meet crises that could arise in the future. We simply cannot afford [avoid] [9] performing this double duty unless we're willing to gamble with our immediate security and pass on to future generations the legacy of neglect we inherited. That kind of neglect would only weaken peace and stability in the world, both now and in the years ahead.

I have lived through two world wars. I saw the American people rise to meet these crises and I have faith in their willingness to come to their nation's defense in the future. But it's far better to prevent a crisis than to have to face it unprepared at the last moment. That's why we have an overriding moral obligation to invest now, this year, in this budget, in restoring America's strength to keep the peace and preserve our freedom.

Until next week, thanks for listening and God bless you.

Prepared Statement by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (Vessey) Before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 22, 1983 [10]

Foreign Military Sales and Assistance for Fiscal Year 1984

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to share with you the views of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the Security Assistance Program.

We live in a dangerous world; wars and rumors of wars abound—Afghanistan, Iran–Iraq, Lebanon, Angola, Mozambique, Chad, Somalia, Kampuchea, and our own back yard in Central America have all been battlefields in recent days. We and our allies in NATO and East Asia look out on the massive military buildup of the Soviet Union and the threat that military power poses to our security. It is not only a dangerous world; it is an interconnected world. The economies of the free world are inextricably intertwined—for markets, for raw materials, for energy, and for financial support. Our own security is inescapably linked to the security of our allies, friends, and trading partners.

The Security Assistance Program through the years has been a very cost-effective way of supporting the foreign policy objectives of our nation and adding to our own security. The U.S. Security Assistance Programs were key ingredients in the building of our fundamental alliances with the nations of Europe and East Asia, alliances vital to our security today. Security Assistance Programs have helped secure cooperation important to our strategic goals and have supported peace and stability efforts of the United States in the world. At a time when we must rebuild our own defense forces quickly to meet the growing threat, when the cost of the defense build up and the health of our economy are of great concern, the Security Assistance Program should continue to be recognized as an important and efficient investment in our own security.

The strategic objectives of the program today are straight forward. They are: to strengthen the combined defenses of our military alliances to help friends and allies cope with regional threats; to help secure access, overflight, transit and forward basing rights for our own forces; to promote standardization and interoperability of allied forces so we can work more effectively with our friends; to help promote U.S. influence abroad while, at the same time, reducing the influence of the Soviet Union and its proxies; to help secure continuing access to markets, raw materials, and energy sources such as Middle East oil. Most importantly, to help friendly nations secure for themselves peace, freedom, and well-being for their people.

The Security Assistance Program also helps our defense by providing orders for larger production runs of military equipment and reducing unit costs to our own forces. Longer production runs also help improve the defense industrial mobilization base and provide jobs for American workers. Foreign military sales stimulate the flow of foreign currency to the United States and help the balance of payments.

Most important, an effective Security Assistance Program can lessen the likelihood that U.S. troops will have to go into combat abroad.

The Soviet Union uses security assistance to further its objectives in the world, either directly or through surrogates. Cuba, Vietnam, and Libya have exploited instability in the world with the aid of Soviet security assistance. The Soviets expand their security assistance programs quickly where opportunities arise. Sometimes when the United States has not responded to requests for aid from less-developed nations, the Soviets have seized the opportunity to spread their influence through effective use of security assistance programs. Angola, Peru, and North Yemen are examples. In the last 2 years, the Soviets have far outstripped the United States in foreign military sales to Third World nations. Interest-free loans, very low interest rates, and free grants of military equipment are very much a part of the Soviet program. The Soviets have attempted to extend their influence by stationing nearly 20 times more training and support technicians abroad than we have and by training far more foreign military students in the Soviet Union than we do in the United States.

I raise these points not to suggest we are in a security assistance race with Russia, but rather to point out that our potential adversaries recognize and use security assistance programs to achieve their objectives and that our programs will be measured against theirs in many countries.

The U.S. Security Assistance Program needs a strong connection to our national security strategy. About 50 percent of our program goes to Israel and Egypt, and seven countries account for over 80 percent of the program. In addition to Israel and Egypt, they are Turkey, Spain, Greece, Pakistan, and Korea, all countries very important to the United States for a combination of military and political reasons. Nevertheless, the emphasis on those seven countries leaves little flexibility for influencing important strategic areas in the remainder of the world. The Joint Chiefs of Staff would urge more balance in the program, but that the balance be achieved by adding to other important areas and not by reducing support to the seven countries mentioned.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff urge strong support for our friends and allies in Central America and the Caribbean. The region is important to the United States because of our traditional economic and cultural ties and because of its relationship to our strategically important sea lines of communication. The strategic importance of the region can be weighed by assessing the efforts of the Soviet Union and its Cuban surrogates. The Soviets put almost 8 percent of their security assistance into Latin America in contrast to our 3 percent for 1984—a percentage that is double the 1.5 percent of the past few years.

The International Military Education and Training Program deserves the wholehearted support of the Congress. Training military personnel from allied and friendly forces is a very effective way of establishing and maintaining long-term cooperative security relationships with nations whose interests are closely linked to those of the United States. The program has a side benefit of giving a firsthand look at American life and democracy to potentially influential people from many different countries. Over the years, such training here has paid real dividends for the United States. Thousands of foreign leaders have undergone training at senior U.S. military schools during their military careers. For example, fully one-third of the foreign graduates of the U.S. Army Command and General Staff School have attained general or flag rank. During one recently surveyed 5-year period, 160 foreign graduates of U.S. senior service schools had become cabinet ministers, legislators, or ambassadors, and over 1,800 foreign graduates had attained general or flag officer rank. The extension of U.S. influence also has a multiplier effect, since U.S.-trained foreigners train still others. We need to make wider use of training as a security assistance tool and one initiative we support would permit exchanges of training for individuals or units on a reciprocal no-cost basis. At present, the United States and another country engaging in reciprocal training must reimburse each other. Many countries cannot afford U.S. costs. This keeps both sides from benefiting from reciprocal training. In addition, we would like expanded authority to train the police forces of those small countries that have no separate armed services for national defense. These countries, predominantly in the Caribbean, are important to our national security strategy. We also support changing the law so that there is a single standardized cost for training of foreign personnel in U.S. military schools. This would reduce confusion on the part of our allies and reduce fiscal impediments to formal U.S. military schooling.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff strongly support the administration's program to increase the size of the Military Assistance Program (Grant Aid). Many nations in the underdeveloped areas of the world are simply unable to pay for the goods and services they need. The Joint Chiefs of Staff believe that selective use of Grant Aid to strengthen poorer countries in strategic areas is an important supplement to our own defense program.

There is another group of potential recipients that can repay us, but only if the repayment period is extended from the current 12 years to 20 years, with a grace period before the payments must start. We now have these arrangements with Egypt, Greece, Turkey, Sudan, and Somalia. The list of countries in this group should be expanded. The cost of military technology has grown significantly, and inflation is a critical factor—$25 billion in foreign military sales today actually buys less than $10 billion bought only 10 years ago. In fact, today's program is at about the same level, in 1973 dollars, as it was 10 years ago. Because we must charge more for goods and services, we have almost priced ourselves out of the market in many small nations. While interest rates are hard to cope with here at home, poorer nations abroad are having a still tougher time than we are.

Effectiveness of the Security Assistance Program could be improved in certain instances by entering into multi-year commitments for some countries.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff also strongly support lifting the obligation ceiling on the Special Defense Acquisition Fund. The Fund enables us to procure military equipment in anticipation of foreign sales and thus shortens critical production line lead time. Previously, meeting urgent foreign military equipment requirements meant diverting equipment already ordered for our own forces, often delaying U.S. force modernization and impacting on U.S. force readiness. The Special Defense Acquisition Fund is an important addition to our program. It needs more flexibility in application to improve its effectiveness.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to stress again the importance of the Security Assistance Program to our own defense. It is a cost-effective adjunct to the Defense budget. It is surely not a "give-away" program as some have characterized it. The Joint Chiefs of Staff believe the program before you is the minimum required to support the objectives laid out.

Mr. Chairman, thank you for taking the time for this brief discussion of the U.S. Security Assistance Program. I have touched only a few of the high points. I sincerely appreciate the opportunity to discuss these important matters with the committee.

Thank you very much.

Prepared Statement by the Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance, Science and Technology (Schneider) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 3, 1983 [11]

FY 1984 Security Assistance Requests

U.S. foreign assistance programs constitute an integral part of this Nation's response to international political and economic developments throughout the world. Resources provide us with the means to exercise leadership internationally and enable us to help developing countries address their most pressing problems.

Secretary Shultz testified before the full committee on foreign assistance in general. I am here today to discuss U.S. security assistance programs and arms transfer policy.

We have developed an integrated foreign assistance program in which development and security assistance combine to meet our economic and national security objectives as well as those of other countries who share these objectives. Security assistance is but one aspect of the whole. It is important to keep in mind that assistance to promote economic growth and development and security assistance are mutually reinforcing programs that cannot function independently.

The United States has multiple interests involving the developing world. On the economic level, about 40 percent of total U.S. exports are to less developed countries. U.S. industry depends on imports of primary commodities, minerals and petroleum. Open trading and financial systems are important to the economic health of developed and developing countries alike. Economic progress in the developing countries and recovery in the industrialized nations cannot occur independent of regional security and stability. A sense of security from external threat and internal upheaval is a necessary precondition of development, and our own self interest requires that we pay close attention to events in the sometimes seemingly remote countries that are commonly referred to as the third world. It is only at our own peril that we ignore or fail to respond wisely to their security and development needs.

As it is integral to our foreign policy, so too is security assistance an inseparable ingredient of our own defense planning. This administration has sought to enhance the security of the United States and to strengthen its ability to protect its interests in various regions of the world. This requires increasing our own defense capabilities and conducting effective diplomacy. In part, however, it also requires a realistic increase in security assistance to allies and friends around the world.

The link between U.S. defense planning and security assistance is direct and occurs at several levels. The United States alone does not and cannot maintain a force structure and capabilities sufficient to defend the free world. We must depend upon allies to deter local threats to our common interests. We factor their capabilities into our planning and the security assistance program is the vehicle for providing them the necessary equipment and training. It would cost $60,000 to equip and maintain one U.S. soldier in Turkey, should that be necessary; it costs only $9,000 for one Turkish soldier. Thus, security assistance is cost-effective.

Second, security assistance enables us to maintain cooperative relationships necessary for our strategic planning. For example, the Rapid Deployment Force cannot perform its mission in a Southwest Asian contingency unless it can move to the area promptly, equipped to fight as necessary. This requires enroute access and transit rights as well as prepositioned equipment and supplies in the region. We cannot expect other nations to cooperate with us unless we are equally responsive to their legitimate needs. We must be a reliable friend if we are to have reliable friends.

Third, the military security assistance programs are managed by DOD in conjunction with U.S. procurement so that both the United States and the foreign buyer reap the benefits of consolidated planning and economies of scale. This entails both integrated procurement of weapons systems and tying foreign buyers directly into our supply systems to ensure timely, effective logistical support. Cutting back on foreign sales by the United States will only serve to channel these sales to others and raise the costs of our own purchases.

Fourth, security assistance helps to maintain a strong defense industrial base in the United States. Virtually all security assistance resources are spent in the United States on U.S. equipment and services.

Finally, allies and friends who are able to deter and defend against local threats provide the President time and choices in a crisis situation. Specifically, the President is not faced with the sudden choice of intervening directly with U.S. forces at the request of an ally, or acquiescing to aggression. A security assistance recipient with a strong defensive capability provides valuable time for the United States to consider its own appropriate response.

In sum, adequately funded, efficiently administered security assistance programs are essential to U.S. defense planning. Without them, our own defense effort would be both far more costly and, in times of crisis, even dangerously crippled.

One aspect of security assistance that bears special mention is the Economic Support Fund [ESF].[12] ESF is not simply another form of credit for military purchases. We do program a major percentage of ESF to countries where we also have a significant military assistance program. But we use ESF to address economic problems in a way that both complements and enhances the military assistance we provide.

Many LDC's today are reeling from the multiple shock of high energy costs, decreased demand for their exports, and their own economic mismanagement. Political stability and the ability to fend off external threats are simply impossible objectives if a country cannot achieve economic growth sufficient to enable it to meet the aspirations of its people. ESF helps the United States assert a leadership role in fostering economic recovery in nations of high strategic importance to us. In some instances, such as Israel, ESF provides needed budget support. In others, such as Pakistan, Jamaica and the Sudan, ESF helps us to support countries that are making efforts to restructure their economies and to become more self-reliant in the future. In still others, such as Kenya and Botswana, ESF meets basic human needs as do development assistance programs. Flexibility is the most important attribute of ESF, and it is an important complement to other trade, finance and aid policies and programs.

FISCAL YEAR 1983 SUPPLEMENTAL

The fiscal year 1983 continuing resolution under which we are operating does not provide adequate funds to achieve necessary national security objectives.

After careful consideration, we have reluctantly concluded that we cannot, without sacrificing important interests, operate within continuing resolution levels. Our problems are accentuated further by the extensive earmarking in existing authorization legislation and in the continuing resolution itself. The administration is obliged, therefore, to seek additional funding for the current fiscal year coincident with our request for fiscal year 1984.

Before getting into specifics, let me review briefly the five security assistance programs. Although well known to you, they have evolved to meet changing needs around the world.

Foreign Military Sales [FMS] financing facilitates the purchase of U.S. military equipment, spares or training. There are two types of FMS financing: direct credits, which involve appropriated funds, and guarantied loans, which do not. While direct credit can, under the law, be provided with varying degrees of concessionality, the Congress has in recent years limited its use to a few recipients, for which it has waived in advance the requirement to repay. USG guarantied loans are provided to a wide range of countries—but 85 percent of the program is directed to seven key countries (Spain, Turkey, Greece, [12] All brackets are in the source text.

Pakistan, Israel, Egypt, and Korea). Such loans are made by the Federal Financing Bank and bear an interest rate reflecting the cost of money to the Treasury.

The Economic Support Fund [ESF], of which I have already spoken, provides loans or grants to promote political and economic stability in countries of special economic, political or security interest to the United States. This assistance may be in the form of cash transfers for balance of payments or budget support, commodity import programs or project assistance.

The Military Assistance Program [MAP] provides grant funding for defense articles and services. Whereas in the past MAP was used to provide specific military items, it currently helps recipient countries pay for equipment purchased under the FMS program. We often provide a degree of concessionality in financing military purchases through a combination of FMS guarantied loans and grant MAP funds. While the percentage rise over our fiscal year 1983 request is significant, the dollar change is more modest and clearly reflects the continuing impact of worldwide recession on the ability of recipients to pay for necessary defense requirements.

International military education and training [IMET] provides grant funds for professional military training. Most is used to bring promising military personnel to the United States for specialized training—which often has the added advantage of exposing future military leaders to American values and institutions. The IMET program, while relatively small in dollars committed, may well have the highest marginal return of any assistance program.

Peacekeeping operations [PKO], the smallest of the security assistance accounts, permits us to participate in multilateral peacekeeping activities in some of the world's most volatile areas. For fiscal years 1983 and 1984, the only peacekeeping programs foreseen are those in the Sinai and Cyprus.

LEBANON SUPPLEMENTAL

I would like to turn now to the first of the two supplemental authorizations we are seeking: $251 million to help restore peace and stability in war-torn Lebanon. This is a one-time special reconstruction package. In fiscal year 1984 and beyond, we expect to revert to traditional levels of assistance. Others will testify in greater detail on the supplemental and I will only briefly review the three component requests.

The $150 million in ESF grants. These are "no-year" funds to be obligated in both fiscal year 1983, and fiscal year 1984, about $100 million and $50 million respectively. These funds, together with funds from other donors, will help the Lebanese Government rebuild its shattered economic infrastructure.

The $100 million in FMS guaranteed loans. This will help finance phase II, if necessary, and phase III of the effort to reconstitute the Lebanese Armed Forces. Phase I, now almost complete, involves the formation of four new brigades and equipping them to 70-percent strength. Phase II will bring one of those brigades up to 100-percent strength and add a fifth brigade. We have signed letters of offer for most of this equipment except APC's which will require congressional notification. The total bill for Phase II is expected to be on the order of $55 million. Phase III would add two more brigades at a cost of $105 million.

The $1 million in IMET. This will send U.S. training teams to Lebanon and bring Lebanese military officers and enlisted crews to the United States for specialized training.

I am certain that members of this committee recognize that very important national interests are at stake in troubled Lebanon. We have a vital interest in ending hostilities and promoting the withdrawal of all foreign forces in a manner that promotes lasting peace and stability. The MNF cannot play a permanent, direct role in maintaining internal security. The LAF must gradually assume responsibility for that job. The exact shape of LAF deployments will be determined in part by the outcome of the current negotiations with Israel.

The question is not whether we should participate in Lebanon's recovery nor whether we should help Lebanon develop the capacity to defend its national integrity, but how quickly we can bring about these goals. I urge you to consider this supplemental request on an urgent basis so that we can continue the enormous task of reconstruction.

FISCAL YEAR 1983 SECURITY ASSISTANCE SUPPLEMENTAL

Our other supplemental authorization request also requires urgent attention. In these times of economic constraints and domestic belt-tightening, it takes a really serious situation to come before the Congress to ask for more foreign aid. We are convinced, however, that the request in this case is not only justified, but that we have no responsible alternative.

The reasons are these:

The continuing resolution is $961 million, or 11 percent, below the amount we requested for security assistance in fiscal year 1983. This means cuts of 48 percent in MAP, 17 percent in IMET, 16 percent in FMS guaranteed loans, and 8 percent in ESF. There was a 24-percent increase in forgiven FMS credit, but this was completely earmarked for Israel and Egypt (at levels above the administration request) and did not provide funds for the Sudan program, earmarked in authorization legislation.

Indeed, more than half of the MAP, ESF, and FMS guarantied loan is earmarked. This magnifies the reductions to be absorbed by the remaining unearmarked countries. For instance, the effective cut for these countries averages nearly 70 percent in MAP and 50 percent in FMS.

We cannot carry out an effective security assistance program with such extensive reductions. We face unacceptable choices as to which critical interests to fulfill and which to sacrifice.

We do not seek a total restoration of the difference between our request and the CR level. We are requesting $167 million in additional MAP appropriations, of which only $142 million requires authorization; $144.5 million more in ESF appropriations, of which $82 million requires authorization; and $425 million in FMS guarantied loans. Let me describe how the supplemental funds will be used.

Major MAP recipients will be: Sudan ($50 million); Tunisia ($30 million); Thailand ($16 million); and Kenya ($12.5 million). As I noted above, $50 million in forgiven FMS credit is earmarked in authorization legislation for Sudan, yet no funds were appropriated. Sudan faces severe economic problems and a serious threat from neighboring Libya. Its continued security is important to the Middle East peace process, and to our access to Southwest Asia should the need arise. The Sudanese economy is in dire straits; it cannot service sizable high interest guarantied loans.

Tunisia, another good friend threatened by Libya, needs MAP, coupled with additional guarantied loans, to purchase tanks and transport aircraft. The total package provides necessary concessionality to help Tunisia's military modernization program.

A similar rationale supports our proposals for Thailand, which just last week was attacked by the Soviet-backed Vietnamese forces ranged along its eastern border, and for Kenya, which contributes to stability and to our objectives in the Horn of Africa and Southwest Asia. We are also seeking small amounts of MAP funding in the supplemental to prevent several small programs in Africa and Latin America from being eliminated.

Major ESF recipients are: Turkey ($55 million), Sudan ($25 million), Zimbabwe ($15 million) and the Dominican Republic and Cyprus ($10 million each). Last year we pledged $350 million to a multilateral effort through OECD to help put Turkey back on its financial feet. The requested $55 million, together with the $245 million allocated under the CR for this purpose, still leaves us $50 million short of our pledge.

For Sudan we hope to generate matching support from others to enable Sudan to meet IMF foreign exchange requirements. Such support is essential for a country whose annual debt service costs are expected to exceed its total exports this year. We seek additional funds for Zimbabwe to fulfill our public pledge to provide $75 million for three years.

The administration remains committed to fostering Caribbean economic growth and stability. The supplemental is essential to this endeavor. We are asking as well for supplemental funds to meet the congressional earmarks for Cyprus, and for added funding for the Middle East regional program which promotes cooperation between Israel and Egypt.

The off-budget FMS guarantied loan request of $425 million will support Pakistan ($75 million), Korea ($70 million), Turkey ($65 million), Tunisia ($43 million), Jordan ($35 million), and Indonesia

($30 million). Several smaller country programs require funding to prevent them from being eliminated altogether. The Pakistan program will be raised to the requested level consistent with our 5-year program of support for that country and to permit Pakistan to pay for equipment already ordered. Korea has been forced by resource constraints to postpone badly needed modernization programs in such areas as air defense radar installation. The supplemental will enable us to restore the 33-percent cut from the requested level. The request for Turkey will allow a slight increase over the amount provided in fiscal year 1982 to offset grant MAP reductions mandated in the CR. The request for Jordan will return this critical program to its requested level. If Jordan is to join the peace process, it must be confident of U.S. support.

We are not seeking supplemental increases in funds for either IMET—although reductions have forced major retrenchments in this highly effective program—or in peacekeeping operations.

Our security assistance program in fiscal year 1983 has been seriously compromised by inadequate funding. We have planned for these extremely scarce funds to continue the absolute highest priority country programs and to conform to the congressional earmarks. However, if the supplemental request is not approved, country programs that are only marginally less critical will suffer grievously and many of the smaller programs will have to be either cut to the point of ineffectiveness or terminated altogether. We do not want—and we trust the Congress does not want—to be responsible for the negative impact on U.S. interests and our bilateral relationships that would result.

FISCAL YEAR 1984 SECURITY ASSISTANCE REQUEST

Now let me move on to what would normally have been the only subject of my testimony today—the fiscal year 1984 security assistance authorization request.

We are requesting total security assistance programs of $9.2 billion, requiring $4.8 billion in new fiscal year 1984 budget authority. There is no real growth. In fact, the program total represents a modest 4.5-percent increase over our revised request for fiscal year 1983. By program, we are seeking authorization of $697 million in MAP, which is essential to provide for increased military inputs at more concessional rates; a virtual straight-lining of ESF, to $2,949 million; $56.532 million in IMET; and $4,436 million in off-budget FMS guarantied loans. We are requesting $1 billion in forgiven FMS direct credits for Israel and Egypt, and a PKO contribution of $46.2 million for the multilateral force and observers in the Sinai and the U.S. forces in Cyprus.

These figures are determined by an interagency process which carefully reviews all our programs. Our key strategic objectives are established and coordinated with foreign policy and defense planning. We then design a security assistance program that is carefully integrated with development assistance priorities to fulfill key strategic objectives. Since I have recently returned from accompanying the Secretary on a trip to East Asia, I would like to discuss that vital area of the world first.

EAST ASIA: PROMOTING PACIFIC SECURITY

For the Pacific, we are requesting $506 million for ten countries—about 5.5 percent of the total security assistance request. The bulk of funding here goes to countries with which we have firm mutual security agreements. More than 85 percent of the program goes to three countries: Korea, Thailand, and the Philippines.

The Republic of Korea is directly threatened by North Korea, which spends 15-20 percent of GNP on arms, has 12 percent larger forces than the south, and more than twice the number of artillery pieces, tanks, and combat aircraft. Our $230 million request will help Korea purchase priority items in its second force improvement plan such as aircraft, air defense missiles and improved armor and artillery capability.

For Thailand, we are requesting $106.4 million to be used primarily for tanks, antiaircraft missiles and aircraft. The Thais face a direct threat from an estimated 180,000 Soviet-backed Vietnamese soldiers across their eastern border in Kampuchea. By assisting Thailand, we help to deter aggression and show Asian countries our commitment to support their independence and security. Our assistance program also has a catalytic effect by encouraging greater regional political and defense cooperation.

Our fiscal year 1984 program for the Philippines represents the final year of the security assistance pledge which President Carter made in 1979 following the successful amendment of the military base agreement.[13] Clark Air Base, Subic Naval Base, and other facilities there help to sustain the U.S. position as an Asian Power and to project American power into the Indian Ocean. Finally, I would note our two smaller but important programs in Indonesia and Malaysia, which promote security interests in these populous, resource rich countries lying beside vital sea links between the Pacific and Indian Oceans.

FURTHERING THE MIDDLE EAST PEACE PROCESS

A fundamental U.S. objective, requiring the largest percentage of funds, is to further the Middle East peace process. Nowhere is the need for consistency, reliability, and balance in U.S. foreign policy more evident than in the Middle East. Our policy in the region is based on two mutually reinforcing goals: (1) the search for a just and lasting peace among all of the States in the area, and (2) the requirement that our friends in the region be able to assure their security against threats from the outside and from the pressures of Soviet surrogates and radical forces within the region.

U.S. assistance programs to Israel and Egypt reflect our best appraisal of their real needs. Our programs are designed to help give these nations the confidence to continue on the path toward peace begun at Camp David.

Lebanon and Jordan are also critical to peace and security in the Middle East. I spoke earlier about Lebanon in the context of the fiscal year 1983 supplemental. The strengthening of institutions and the fostering of a national consensus in Lebanon would help significantly to stabilize the area and would thereby remove one of the major flashpoints of conflict in the region.

Our continued support for Jordan increases its ability to remain a viable, moderate actor in the region and encourages it to assume an active role in the peace process. Numerically outmanned by a potentially aggressive neighbor, Jordan depends on well-equipped, high quality, highly motivated forces to deter attack. Inasmuch as the risks to Jordan would increase if it joins the peace process, Jordan must know that it has a staunch friend in the United States who will supply and provide financing for military modernization needs. The requested $115 million program for Jordan is designed to help modernize the armed forces through purchases of equipment including armor, artillery, airlift equipment, and tow missiles.

For fiscal year 1984 we plan to devote about 51 percent of our total security assistance program to this peace effort. In program terms, this is $1,570 million in ESF, $1,000 million in forgiven FMS credit, $2,130 million in FMS guaranteed loans, $4.75 million in IMET, and $37.2 million for peacekeeping operations in the Sinai. By country, it amounts to $2,485 million for Israel, $2,052 million for Egypt, $137 million for Jordan, and $15.75 million for Lebanon.

STRENGTHENING THE NATO ALLIANCE AND EUROPE

The strategic importance of Europe's southern flank to NATO and the West has been dramatically underlined by events this past year. Helping these nations acquire the materiel and training needed to meet effectively their NATO responsibilities is an important contribution to our common defense, not only against threats to NATO but against challenges to our common interests beyond the geographic bounds of the alliance.

Portugal and Spain hold a strategic position along the principal lines of access to Europe and the Middle East/Southwest Asia. The Portuguese, with the aid of their allies, are determined to play a larger role in NATO and in the defense of Western interests. Basing facilities in Portugal are key to NATO reinforcement, ASW operations and possibly out of area contingencies. The fiscal year 1984 FMS/MAP request of $105 million will help provide a second squadron of A-7P aircraft, the startup of an anti-submarine warfare frigate program, and increased P-3 and C-130 capability. Spain's decision to join NATO is a historic milestone on the road to that nation's full reentry into the West European community. It underscores Spain's desire to reinforce democratic institutions. Our $400 million FMS request serves to solidify progress in this direction and helps ensure the access we need to bases vital to our own defense posture.

In our defense cooperation agreement with Turkey, we have undertaken to assist the Turkish Armed Forces in their efforts to modernize their dangerously obsolescent military inventory. Turkey is outnumbered three to one by Warsaw Pact ground troops, armed with the most modern armaments in the Soviet arsenal garrisoned in the nearby trans Caucasus and Thrace. Similarly, Warsaw Pact aircraft vastly outnumber Turkish aircraft in the region. We are requesting $755 million in FMS/MAP to help Turkey purchase a wide variety of equipment including some replacements for its obsolete fighter aircraft. The use of MAP funds will limit the impact of this large program on Turkey's heavy debt service schedule. We cannot understate Turkey's importance, standing as it does at the intersection of our NATO, Southwest Asia, and Middle East strategies.

Security assistance demonstrates American support for a democratic Greece willing and able to fulfill its NATO responsibility and to help ensure political stability in the Eastern Mediterranean. We have straight-lined the Greek program because base negotiations currently are underway. To do otherwise would compromise our ability to reach a reasonable agreement. We have told the Greeks, however, that we are prepared to request additional funds in the context of a satisfactory defense cooperation agreement.

We intend to commit $1,790 million in security assistance to the European southern tier states of Spain, Portugal, Greece, Turkey, and Cyprus. By program this will consist of $230 million in ESF, $290 million in MAP, $1,250 million in FMS guaranteed loans, $11.7 million in IMET, and $9 million for the U.N. forces in Cyprus. By country, it will be $12 million for Cyprus, $281.7 million for Greece, $148 million for Portugal, $415 million for Spain, and $934 million for Turkey.

SOUTHWEST ASIA

Southwest Asia remains the critical source of energy for the Free World. Broadly defined, this area stretches from Pakistan in the East to Morocco in the West. Almost all these countries face severe economic problems and potential subversion or regional threats, in many cases supported by the Soviets or their proxies.

Our 5-year program of military modernization and economic assistance will help Pakistan to meet the Soviet threat from Afghanistan and facilitate the economic development essential to internal stability. Our renewed strategic relationship will help deter further actions by the Soviets and support Pakistani resolve to continue to oppose Soviet aggression in Afghanistan. A Pakistan more confident of its security has less need for and motivation to develop nuclear explosives. The $300 million FMS request will be used for progress payments on the $1.7 billion package of military assistance already underway including F-16 aircraft. As you know, the first six F-16's recently arrived in country and the reaction was overwhelmingly positive for United States-Pakistan security relations.

Sudan, Morocco, and Tunisia all face threats of subversion or aggression emanating from or supported by Libya. Sudan also faces a significant potential military threat from Ethiopia. These countries have difficult economic problems. Grant U.S. assistance is needed to enhance military preparedness without adding to already excessive economic burdens.

Given Oman's strategic location on the strait of Hormuz and close cooperation on regional security issues, we put high priority on improving its defense forces. The Yemen Arab Republic, strategically located on the Bab El-Mandeb Straits and the southwest flank of Saudi Arabia, faces a well-armed, Marxist-led insurgency supported by South Yemen and Libya. With a deteriorating economic situation, this country requires both development and security assistance to enable it to maintain its independence and stability.

Also along the Indian Ocean Littoral, in both Kenya and Somalia, we seek to encourage economic self-reliance and the development of defense capabilities consistent with economic realities. Both nations count as key features in our own defense planning for the region and Somalia faces continuing pressure from Ethiopian border attacks. Our aid to the island states helps maintain U.S. access and influence in the Indian Ocean.

We plan to commit some $1.188 million to security assistance for the 12 countries whose cooperation we consider essential to our Southwest Asia policy. Programmatically, this will include $451 million in ESF, $220 million in MAP, $507 million in FMS guaranties, and $10.15 million in IMET. The major country programs are Pakistan at $525.8 million, Sudan at $181.5 million, Tunisia at $141.7 million, Morocco at $98.7 million, Kenya at $78.65 million, Somalia at $76 million and Oman at $60.1 million.

RESTORING STABILITY AND PROGRESS IN THE CARIBBEAN BASIN

We face a major challenge in the Caribbean Basin, where Cuba has sought to exploit socio-economic problems and military vulnerabilities. The fiscal year 1982 CBI supplemental was never intended to cure all problems; we must continue to provide resources until increased investment, a strengthened private sector, and expanded export markets enable these countries to achieve more economic self-sufficiency.

El Salvador, where the guerrillas seek to destroy the economy and take over the Government, would be the largest single recipient of both economic and military assistance in the Caribbean Basin. The Salvadoran economy has been in sharp decline since 1978; in real terms the value of goods and services produced now is estimated to be 25 percent below 1978. We have allocated $140 million in ESF for fiscal year 1983 and are requesting $120 million for fiscal year 1984 in an effort to restore production in what was one of Latin America's most efficient economies. Honduras faces a severe economic decline and a large military buildup in neighboring Nicaragua. Costa Rica's rapidly deteriorating economy will require substantial assistance while fundamental reforms are effected. Jamaica will continue to need substantial assistance in order to restore the vitality of its private sector. Because of deteriorating conditions, other countries in the region, including Guatemala and the Dominican Republic, require substantial amounts of economic assistance. We are proposing a new FMS program for Guatemala in fiscal year 1984 because of the importance of Guatemala in Central America, the threat the country faces, and the progress being made in improving human rights.

Under the security assistance rubric, we expect to devote about $558 million to CBI countries and regional programs. This will include $398 million in ESF, $109.8 million in MAP, $45 million in FMS guarantees and $5.13 million in IMET funds. The major recipients will be El Salvador at $206.3 million, Honduras at $81 million, Costa Rica at $72.15 million, Jamaica at $59.2 million, Guatemala at $50.25 million and the Dominican Republic at $45.75 million.

OTHER STRATEGIC GROUPINGS

We also propose in fiscal year 1984, in addition to these areas of strategic concern in the United States, to provide security assistance to a number of other countries in troubled parts of the world.

Our policy in southern Africa is designed to advance the peace process in Namibia, ensure continued western access to key strategic minerals, and support the development process from Zaire to the Cape. We are committed to assist the economic development of the frontline states in southern Africa, whose participation is essential to the resolution of conflict there. The alternative—a new escalation of conflict—would provide significant new opportunities for the Cubans and the Soviets. We seek $181 million in security assistance for this region.

Adequate aid is essential to maintain peace and stability in western Africa, where financial difficulties risk exploitation by Libya. We propose modest new ESF programs for two threatened, staunchly pro-western countries, Senegal and Niger. Our aid to Liberia is designed to address its immediate financial crisis, stimulate long-term development, ensure continued U.S. access to key transportation and communications facilities, and facilitate the return to civilian government in 1985. Our assistance elsewhere in West Africa is limited to FMS loans in Cameroon and Gabon and to 14 IMET programs.

The President's recent trip to Latin America underscored America's commitment to play a major role in addressing the key problems of our neighbors to the south. In furthering our strategic and national security interest in the southern part of the hemisphere, we are seeking $51 million primarily for FMS guaranteed loans to Peru, Colombia and Ecuador.

In concluding this portion of my remarks, I would emphasize that none of these figures is intended to set a cash value on the relationship between the United States and the recipient country. Nor do they in all cases indicate the total amount of assistance we propose to provide, as many will receive various other types of development assistance as well. Our security assistance budget proposal is, I believe, carefully crafted to move us toward a variety of strategic objectives at minimum expense to the American taxpayer.

FISCAL YEAR 1984 LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS

Mr. Chairman, I would now like to address several of our legislative proposals for fiscal year 1984. These include new proposals together with those submitted last year. Many of the latter were included in the authorization bill reported by this committee. We have made an effort to limit the number and scope of the proposals to those essential to the effective operation and administration of the programs. We regard those which are before you as extremely important and urge their consideration and adoption.

NEW PROPOSALS

Let me highlight some of the more important proposals. General Gast will also speak to these proposals.

We seek a change to section 21 of the Arms Export Control Act (AECA) [14] to simplify the current, multi-tier pricing structure on sales of training. By allowing us to charge all purchasers an amount equal to the "additional cost" not otherwise incurred by the United States in providing the training, this proposal would reduce discrimination among countries yet ensure that the United States recoups the total cost attributed to such training. This proposal is similar to that enacted recently for grant training.

Earlier I mentioned the impact that earmarking in legislation has on our ability to allocate available funds to meet priority objectives. The most serious problems arise from earmarks in authorization and appropriations legislation, which assume availability of the funds authorized in that bill. When the worldwide availability for ESF or MAP is reduced, often severely in a CR, we must nonetheless fund specific countries at the full amounts earmarked. This creates serious distortions in country allocations, often unintended, by forcing disproportionately severe cuts in unearmarked country programs.

To help deal with this problem, the administration is proposing enactment of a provision that would reduce earmarks, when operating under a CR, to the same proportion of the total funds available under the CR as the original earmark was to the total funds available for the relevant account in the law which established the earmark. We recognize, Mr. Chairman, that the Congress may not authorize and appropriate all the funds that have been requested. When funds are reduced, however, earmarking places us in a straitjacket which prevents rational country allocations. The combination of lower funding and extensive earmarks is devastating. I strongly urge adoption of this proposal.

We also need adequate numbers of personnel in certain countries to manage the security assistance program. The number of overseas military personnel declined significantly in the late 1970's. Congress took the lead in bringing about the reductions, many of which were warranted and overdue. As certain programs grow in size and importance, however, we must seek prudent increases. Accordingly, we propose to amend section 515 of the FAA to add 9 new countries to the 12 currently authorized to have more than 6 uniformed personnel. These include Pakistan, Tunisia, Yemen, Liberia, Sudan, Zaire, El Salvador, Honduras, and Venezuela.

We propose to add Korea to the short list of countries authorized to receive extended payment terms on FMS guaranteed loans. The size of the Korea program has been reduced significantly in recent years. The reduction was not by choice but because Korea, as an unearmarked country, was forced to bear a sizeable portion of the reductions in overall funding. This proposal would allow Korea to spread out its repayments and spend a larger portion of its own funds on needed military purchases.

Current law requires that countries that sell or dispose of U.S. equipment provided under the MAP program return the proceeds to the United States because there is no incentive to eliminate obsolete equipment which drains available O&M funds, countries maintain such equipment in their inventories even when to do so is uneconomical. We are proposing to add a waiver authority that would allow the [14] P.L. 94-329; 90 Stat. 729. This law has been amended several times since its enactment in 1976.

President, on a country-by-country basis, to permit countries to keep the proceeds of sale when it is in the U.S. national interest to do so. All applicable legal and policy controls of third country transfers would continue to apply to any sales of this equipment.

CARRYOVER FROM FISCAL YEAR 1983

Very briefly, Mr. Chairman, I want to mention a few of the fiscal year 1983 proposals which we are once again requesting in fiscal year 1984.

Authorization of an antiterrorism training program. Our proposal incorporates virtually all of the changes made by the committees last year. This program would become effective upon enactment of the bill to provide antiterrorism assistance. Authorization of $5 million is requested for fiscal year 1984.

Removal of prohibitions against assistance to China. This proposal removes China from the prohibited list of "Communist" countries in section 620(f) of the FAA.

Permit reciprocal no-cost exchange training on a one-for-one basis for professional military at war colleges and command and staff colleges. Establish a threshold of $50,000 on reprogramming notices to the Congress for international narcotics control and IMET programs.

Mr. Chairman, we are presenting you with several proposals—two fiscal year 1983 supplemental authorization bills plus the regular fiscal year 1984 bill. We request your urgent and careful consideration of them. The legislative and budgetary requests have been scrutinized thoroughly within the administration and meet all of our essential criteria in a very tight budget year. In conclusion, I ask you to consider not only the costs of providing the requested assistance, but also the costs of not providing it.

ARMS TRANSFER POLICY

With respect to arms transfers and arms transfer policy, I would merely reiterate what many officials of this administration have said before: we consider arms transfers to be an instrument of U.S. policy, not an exceptional instrument as our predecessors tried but in fact failed to establish nor as a largely commercial activity as is the case with a number of some other nations. We will continue to weigh carefully all of the relevant considerations likely to bear upon any specific arms transfer decision in order to determine whether that transfer is, on balance, in the clear U.S. national interest. These considerations include, of course, the military purpose of the proposed transfer, the ability of the recipient to absorb and operate the equipment, the economic impact of the proposed transfer upon the recipient, the impact upon surrounding states—stabilizing or destabilizing in the region—and so on. As a practical matter, we continue to turn down proposed sales at a rate not significantly lower than our predecessors. This approach, we firmly believe, is sensible and ensures that arms transfers are integrated effectively with other instruments of policy and contribute to our broader strategic objectives.

Arms transfers are inherently neither good nor evil. A given weapon system is not stabilizing or destabilizing as an abstract proposition. Arbitrary restraint and unrestricted transfers are equally unrelated to U.S. national interests. There is no virtue in cutting arms transfers, or increasing them, in the aggregate. Transfers can fairly be evaluated only in terms of their impact on specific U.S. interests in specific countries and regions, taking into account military, political and economic realities at the time.

We have established a rigorous internal review process on arms transfers. All relevant departments and agencies have an opportunity to review major proposed transfers and present their views. This provides me, and other decisionmakers, with assessments of military need, political impact, regional implications, arms control factors and affordability.

Sometimes there are clear and easy choices, that is, approval or disapproval is unambiguously in the U.S. interest. In other cases, there are valid pros and cons. We must then decide whether, on balance, a proposed transfer is in the U.S. interest. We consult with the Congress, both to factor your advice into the decisionmaking process and to acquaint you with the factors bearing on the case, to sensitize you to the grey areas, and to minimize potential differences if we approve a sale and transmit it to you pursuant to section 36(b) of the AECA.

We also give close scrutiny to transfers of systems that incorporate advanced or sensitive technology. We must be assured that such technology will be adequately protected. This factor adds complexity to our analysis, because we must take into account the potential stability of recipient government over the lifetime of the equipment being sold. The probability that a country will continue to share common policy objectives with us over the long haul is an important consideration as well.

Arms transfers are not substitutes for other forms of diplomacy. They are not an alternative to a long-term coincidence of national security interests between the United States and another government. They cannot guarantee harmonious bilateral relationships when fundamental interests diverge. The Soviets learned this in Egypt, Somalia, and earlier in Indonesia or as we have experienced Iran and Ethiopia.

This being said, however, arms transfers should be and are an integral part of our security relationships with friendly countries who seek to deter and defend against neighbors who are, most likely, armed by the Soviets or other East Bloc countries. As I stated earlier in my testimony, if we want reliable friends, we must be one ourselves. Countries who cast their lot with the United States must know that they can count on our support to meet their legitimate military needs. Failure to respond prudently and appropriately to these needs would seriously damage our credibility as a leader of the free world, would increase the chances of U.S. forces having to be deployed in a crisis, and would jeopardize defense cooperation with countries which provide access and facilities to the U.S.A. military. Our ability to supply friendly nations with appropriate arms contributes to a reduction in what would be larger U.S. defense needs to meet our national security objectives.

Both my associates—General Gast of the Defense Security Assistance Agency and Mr. Turrentine of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency—are prepared to speak further to this subject, but first I would like to provide some factual basis for our discussion.

Government-to-government arms sales have fluctuated in recent years, from $1.3 [13?] billion in fiscal 1979, and $15.3 billion in fiscal 1980, to $8.5 billion in fiscal 1981 and $21.5 billion in fiscal 1982. They are, of course, subject to inflation like other areas of the economy; thus the levels for the past 3 years, in constant fiscal year 1979 dollars, would more nearly approximate $13.6 billion, $6.6 billion and $16.3 billion respectively:

Foreign Military Sales Agreements

(Billions of dollars)

	1979	1980	1981	1982
Current dollars	$13.0	$15.3	$8.5	$21.5
Constant fiscal year 1979 dollars	13.0	13.6	6.6	16.3

Commercial military exports have, in recent years, approximated $2 billion or less per year. This figure might rise somewhat since the Congress removed the commercial arms sales ceiling several years ago.

The surge in arms sales in 1982 largely reflects the impact of several large transactions. During recent years, for example, the U.S. has approved or has under consideration the following major cases:

	Billions (about)
Trident for the U.K.	$4.0
F-18's for Spain	3.0
F-18's for Australia	2.6
F-16's for Israel	2.7

The four sales exceed $12 billion or more than half the fiscal year 1982 level of $21.5 billion. Adding the $8 billion Saudi AWACS package would, with just the five largest transfers of the past 2 or 3 years, virtually match the entire fiscal year 1982 total. Shifting such large sales from one year to another can dramatically change annual totals, with absolutely no policy implications.

In fact, the high fiscal year 1982 levels following the low fiscal year 1981 level is largely an artifact of just such a shift of the Saudi AWACS package from fiscal year 1981 into fiscal year 1982 as a result of the extended congressional debate. Averaging those two fiscal years yields annual levels of some $15 billion—about the same as fiscal year 1980.

For the record, I would like to provide you with some additional detail on the major arms transfer recipients in fiscal year 1982.

Fiscal year 1982 major arms transfers recipients

	Millions
Saudi Arabia:
Weapons-related	$5,170.0
Construction	1,844.0
Total	7,014.0
Australia	2,653.5
Egypt	1,943.2
Pakistan	1,422.9
South Korea	1,046.4
Total	14,080.0

These five countries, therefore, accounted for fully two-thirds of total fiscal year 1982 sales; adding the next largest eight recipients brings the total to nearly $17 billion or about 80 percent of the total for fiscal year 1982.

Venezuela	$615.3
Turkey	411.0
Netherlands	324.2
Tunisia	320.3
Taiwan	297.1
Japan	256.1
Federal Republic of Germany	79.9
Total	2,848.2

I would note that very few of these have been the subject of significant controversy.

With respect to fiscal year 1983, it is difficult at this point to make a confident projection; however, we will provide an estimate, in the classified arms sales proposal, as required by law. At this point, we have concluded some $5.7 billion in arms transfer agreements for the current fiscal year. Of this amount, about 60 percent is accounted for by just five sales—to Saudi Arabia, Japan, and NATO plus two NATO-member countries:

Major fiscal year 1983 arms transfer agreements—March 1, 1983

	Billions
Saudi naval program	$2.365
United Kingdom Trident program	1.178
Japan—helicopters	.275
Netherlands—F-16's	.218

In conclusion, I would like to remind you of the relationship between arms sales and U.S. assistance programs. In general terms, our military financing has covered roughly 20 or 25 percent of annual approved arms sales agreements in recent years. The remainder has been paid for in cash. Of the financed portion, between two-thirds and three-fourths has been at the cost-of-money to the U.S. Treasury—in recent years as high as 14 percent. The remaining fraction has been paid for by grant U.S. financing, largely to Israel and Egypt.

Address by President Reagan Before the Annual Convention of the National Association of Evangelicals, Orlando, Florida, March 8, 1983 (Extract) [15]

Moral Foundation for a Strong National Defense

[15] Source: White House Press Release, March 8, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President; also printed in Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, March 14, 1983, pp. 367–370. The source text is the text as actually delivered.

There is sin and evil in the world. And we are enjoined by scripture and the Lord Jesus to oppose it with all our might. Our nation, too, has a legacy of evil with which it must deal. The glory of this land has been its capacity for transcending the moral evils of our past. For example, the long struggle of minority citizens for equal rights once a source of disunity and civil war is now a point of pride for all Americans. We must never go back. There is no room for racism, anti-semitism or other forms of ethnic and racial hatred in this country. (Applause) I know that you have been horrified, as have I, by the resurgence of some hate groups preaching bigotry and prejudice. Use the mighty voice of your pulpits and the powerful standing of your churches to denounce and isolate these hate groups in our midst. The commandment given us is clear and simple: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." (Applause)

But whatever sad episodes exist in our past, any objective observer must hold a positive view of American history, a history that has been the story of hopes fulfilled and dreams made into reality. Especially in this century, America has kept alight the torch of freedom, but not just for ourselves, but for millions of others around the world.

And this brings me to my final point today. During my first press conference as President, in answer to a direct question, I pointed out that, as good Marxists-Leninists, the Soviet leaders have openly and publicly declared that the only morality they recognize is that which will further their cause, which is world revolution. [16] I think I should point out, I was only quoting Lenin, their guiding spirit who said in 1920 that they repudiate all morality that proceeds from supernatural ideas—that is their name for religion—or ideas that are outside class conceptions. Morality is entirely subordinate to the interests of class war. And everything is moral that is necessary for the annihilation of the old, exploiting social order and for uniting the proletariat.

Well, I think the refusal of many influential people to accept this elementary fact of Soviet doctrine illustrates an historical reluctance to see totalitarian powers for what they are. We saw this phenomenon in the 1930's. We see it too often today. This does not mean we should isolate ourselves and refuse to seek an understanding with them. I intend to do everything I can to persuade them of our peaceful intent, to remind them that it was the West that refused to use its nuclear monopoly in the 1940's and 1950's for territorial gain and which now proposes 50-percent cuts in strategic ballistic missiles and the elimination of an entire class of land-based intermediate-range nuclear missiles. (Applause)

At the same time, however, they must be made to understand we will never compromise our principles and standards. We will never give away our freedom. We will never abandon our belief in God. (Applause) And we will never stop searching for a genuine peace, but we can assure none of these things America stands for through the so-called nuclear freeze solutions proposed by some.

The truth is that a freeze now would be a very dangerous fraud, for that is merely the illusion of peace. The reality is that we must find peace through strength. (Applause)

I would agree to a freeze if only we could freeze the Soviets' global desires. (Applause) A freeze at current levels of weapons would remove any incentive for the Soviets to negotiate seriously in Geneva, and virtually end our chances to achieve the major arms reductions which we have proposed. Instead, they would achieve their objectives through the freeze. A freeze would reward the Soviet Union for its enormous and unparalleled military buildup. It would prevent the essential and long overdue modernization of United States and allied defenses and would leave our aging forces increasingly vulnerable. And an honest freeze would require extensive prior negotiations on the systems and numbers to be limited and on the measures to ensure effective verification and compliance. And the kind of a freeze that has been suggested would be virtually impossible to verify. Such a major effort would divert us completely from our current negotiations on achieving substantial reductions. (Applause)

A number of years ago, I heard a young father, a very prominent young man in the entertainment world, addressing a tremendous gathering in California. It was during the time of the cold war and communism and our own way of life were very much on people's minds. And he was speaking to that subject. And suddenly, though, I heard him saying, "I love my little girls more than anything—" And I said to myself, "Oh, no, don't. You can't—don't say that." But I had underestimated him. He went on: "I would rather see my little girls die now, still believing in God, than have them grow up under communism and one day die no longer believing in God." (Applause)

There were thousands of young people in that audience. They came to their feet with shouts of joy. They had instantly recognized the profound truth in what he had said, with regard to the physical and the soul and what was truly important.

Yes, let us pray for the salvation of all of those who live in that totalitarian darkness—pray they will discover the joy of knowing God. But until they do, let us be aware that while they preach the supremacy of the state, declare its omnipotence over individual man, and predict its eventual domination of all peoples on the Earth—they are the focus of evil in the modern world. It was C.S. Lewis who, in his unforgettable Screwtape Letters, wrote: "The greatest evil is not done now in those sordid 'dens of crime' that Dickens loved to paint. It is not even done in concentration camps and labor camps. In those we see its final result. But it is conceived and ordered (moved, seconded, carried, and minuted) in clear, carpeted, warmed, and well-lighted offices, by quiet men with white collars and cut fingernails and smooth-shaven cheeks who do not need to raise their voice."

Because these "quiet men" do not "raise their voices," because they sometimes speak in soothing tones of brotherhood and peace, because, like other dictators before them, they're always making "their final territorial demand," some would have us accept them at their word and accommodate ourselves to their aggressive impulses. But, if history teaches anything, it teaches that simple-minded appeasement or wishful thinking about our adversaries is folly. It means the betrayal of our past, the squandering of our freedom.

So, I urge you to speak out against those who would place the United States in a position of military and moral inferiority. You know, I've always believed that old Screwtape reserved his best efforts for those of you in the church. So, in your discussions of the nuclear freeze proposals, I urge you to beware the temptation of pride—the temptation of blithely declaring yourselves above it all and label both sides equally at fault, to ignore the facts of history and the aggressive impulses of an evil empire, to simply call the arms race a giant misunderstanding and thereby remove yourself from the struggle between right and wrong and good and evil.

I ask you to resist the attempts of those who would have you withhold your support for our efforts, this administration's efforts, to keep America strong and free, while we negotiate real and verifiable reductions in the world's nuclear arsenals and one day, with God's help, their total elimination. (Applause)

While America's military strength is important, let me add here that I have always maintained that the struggle now going on for the world will never be decided by bombs or rockets, by armies or military might. The real crisis we face today is a spiritual one; at root, it is a test of moral will and faith.

Whittaker Chambers, the man whose own religious conversion made him a witness to one of the terrible traumas of our time, the Hiss-Chambers case, wrote that the crisis of the Western world exists to the degree in which the West is indifferent to God, the degree to which it collaborates in communism's attempt to make man stand alone without God. And then he said, "For Marxism-Leninism is actually the second oldest faith first proclaimed in the Garden of Eden with the words of temptation, 'Ye shall be as gods.'"

"The Western world can answer this challenge," he wrote, "but only provided that its faith in God and the freedom he enjoins is as great as communism's faith in man."

I believe we shall rise to the challenge. I believe that communism is another sad, bizarre chapter in human history whose last pages even now are being written. I believe this because the source of our strength in the quest for human freedom is not material but spiritual. And because it knows no limitation, it must terrify and ultimately triumph over those who would enslave their fellow man. For in the words of Isaiah: "He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might He increased strength. . . . But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary. . . ." (Applause)

Yes, change your world. One of our Founding Fathers, Thomas Paine, said, "We have it within our power to begin the world over again." We can do it doing together what no one church could do by itself. God bless you and thank you very much. (Applause)

Statement by President Reagan, March 9, 1983 [17]

Soviet Military Power

Our defense policy is based on a very simple premise: the United States will not start fights. We will not be the first to use aggression. We will not seek to occupy other lands or control other peoples. Our strategy is defensive; our aim is to protect the peace by ensuring that no adversaries ever conclude they could best us in a war of their own choosing.

What this means is that we design our defense program not to further ambitions, but to counter threats. Today, and for the foreseeable future, the greatest of these threats comes from the Soviet Union, the only nation with the military power to inflict mortal damage directly on the United States.

This also means that if the American people are asked to support our defense program, they must get the straight facts about this threat. The Defense Department's first edition of Soviet Military Power gave them those facts; this revised edition will keep them up to date and will give them a new opportunity to compare Soviet forces with our own. [18]

The facts in this book are straightforward. The Soviets have not slowed the pace of their enormous military buildup. In little over a year, they have begun testing new models in almost every class of nuclear weapons. They are dramatically expanding their Navy and Air Force, are training and equipping their ground forces for preemptive attack, and are using their military power to extend their influence and enforce their will in every corner of the globe.

We must continue to demonstrate our resolve not to allow the military balance to tip against the United States. By demonstrating that resolve, we will not only deter aggression, but we will also offer the Soviets a real incentive to accept genuine, mutual arms reduction.

Let me quote a statement Winston Churchill made to the House of Commons in late 1934, as he urged the British to stop dismantling their defenses:

> "To urge the preparation of defense is not to assert the imminence of war. I do not believe that war is imminent or that war is inevitable, but . . . that if we do not begin forthwith to put ourselves in a position of security, it will soon be beyond our power to do so."

A strong, credible American defense is indispensable to protecting the peace and preserving the free way of life our people cherish.

Peace and National Security

My fellow Americans, thank you for sharing your time with me tonight.

The address was broadcast live on nationwide radio and television from the Oval Office of the White House beginning at 8:02 p.m. The photographs the President refers to are not reproduced.

The subject I want to discuss with you, peace and national security, is both timely and important. Timely, because I've reached a decision which offers a new hope for our children in the 21st century, a decision I'll tell you about in a few minutes. And important because there's a very big decision that you must make for yourselves.

This subject involves the most basic duty that any President and any people share, the duty to protect and strengthen the peace.

At the beginning of this year, I submitted to the Congress a defense budget which reflects my best judgment of the best understanding of the experts and specialists who advised me about what we and our allies must do to protect our people in the years ahead. That budget is much more than a long list of numbers. For behind all the numbers lies America's ability to prevent the greatest of human tragedies and preserve our free way of life in a sometimes dangerous world. It is part of a careful, long-term plan to make America strong again after too many years of neglect and mistakes.

Our efforts to rebuild America's defenses and strengthen the peace began 2 years ago when we requested a major increase in the defense program. Since then, the amount of those increases we first proposed has been reduced by half, through improvements in management and procurement and other savings.

The budget request that is now before the Congress has been trimmed to the limits of safety. Further deep cuts cannot be made without seriously endangering the security of the nation. The choice is up to the men and women you have elected to the Congress and that means the choice is up to you.

Tonight, I want to explain to you what this defense debate is all about and why I'm convinced that the budget now before the Congress is necessary, responsible, and deserving of your support. And I want to offer hope for the future.

But first, let me say what the defense debate is not about. It is not about spending arithmetic. I know that in the last few weeks you have been bombarded with numbers and percentages. Some say we need only a 5 percent increase in defense spending. The so-called alternate budget backed by liberals in the House of Representatives would lower the figure to 2 to 3 percent, cutting our defense spending by $163 billion over the next 5 years.

The trouble with all these numbers is that they tell us little about the kind of defense program America needs or the benefits and security and freedom that our defense effort buys for us.

What seems to have been lost in all this debate is the simple truth of how a defense budget is arrived at. It isn't done by deciding to spend a certain number of dollars. Those loud voices that are occasionally heard charging that the government is trying to solve a security problem by throwing money at it are nothing more than noise based on ignorance. We start by considering what must be done to maintain peace and review all the possible threats against our security. Then, a strategy for strengthening peace and defending against those threats must be agreed upon. And, finally, our defense establishment must be evaluated to see what is necessary to protect against any or all of the potential threats. The cost of achieving these ends is totaled up and the result is the budget for national defense.

There is no logical way that you can say, let's spend X billion dollars less. You can only say, which part of our defense measures do we believe we can do without and still have security against all contingencies? Anyone in the Congress who advocates a percentage or a specific dollar cut in defense spending should be made to say what part of our defenses he would eliminate, and he should be candid enough to acknowledge that his cuts mean cutting our commitments to allies or inviting greater risk or both.

The defense policy of the United States is based on a simple premise: The United States does not start fights. We will never be an aggressor. We maintain our strength in order to deter and defend against aggression—to preserve freedom and peace.

Since the dawn of the atomic age, we've sought to reduce the risk of war by maintaining a strong deterrent and by seeking genuine arms control. "Deterrence" means simply this: Making sure any adversary who thinks about attacking the United States, or our allies, or our vital interests, concludes that the risks to him outweigh any potential gains. Once he understands that, he won't attack. We maintain the peace through our strength; weakness only invites aggression.

This strategy of deterrence has not changed. It still works. But what it takes to maintain deterrence has changed. It took one kind of military force to deter an attack when we had far more nuclear weapons than any other power; it takes another kind now that the Soviets, for example, have enough accurate and powerful nuclear weapons to destroy virtually all of our missiles on the ground. Now this is not to say that the Soviet Union is planning to make war on us. Nor do I believe a war is inevitable—quite the contrary. But what must be recognized is that our security is based on being prepared to meet all threats.

There was a time when we depended on coastal forts and artillery batteries because, with the weaponry of that day, any attack would have had to come by sea. Well, this is a different world and our defenses must be based on recognition and awareness of the weaponry possessed by other nations in the nuclear age.

We can't afford to believe that we will never be threatened. There have been two world wars in my lifetime. We didn't start them and, indeed, did everything we could to avoid being drawn into them. But we were ill-prepared for both—had we been better prepared, peace might have been preserved.

For 20 years the Soviet Union has been accumulating enormous military might. They didn't stop when their forces exceeded all requirements of a legitimate defensive capability. And they haven't stopped now. During the past decade and a half, the Soviets have built up a massive arsenal of new strategic nuclear weapons—weapons that can strike directly at the United States.

As an example, the United States introduced its last new intercontinental ballistic missile, the Minute Man III, in 1969, and we're now dismantling our even older Titan missiles. But what has the Soviet Union done in these intervening years? Well, since 1969, the Soviet Union has built five new classes of ICBMs, and upgraded these eight times. As a result, their missiles are much more powerful and accurate than they were several years ago and they continue to develop more, while ours are increasingly obsolete.

The same thing has happened in other areas. Over the same period, the Soviet Union built four new classes of submarine-launched ballistic missiles and over 60 new missile submarines. We built two new types of submarine missiles and actually withdrew ten submarines from strategic missions. The Soviet Union built over 200 new Backfire bombers, and their brand new Blackjack bomber is now under development. We haven't built a new long-range bomber since our B-52's were deployed about a quarter of a century ago, and we've already retired several hundred of those because of old age. Indeed, despite what many people think, our strategic forces only cost about 15 percent of the defense budget.

Another example of what's happened: In 1978, the Soviets had 600 intermediate-range nuclear missiles based on land and were beginning to add the SS-20—a new, highly accurate mobile missile, with three warheads. We had none. Since then the Soviets have strengthened their lead. By the end of 1979, when Soviet leader Brezhnev declared "a balance now exists," the Soviets had over 800 warheads. We still had none. A year ago this month, Mr. Brezhnev pledged a moratorium, or freeze, on SS-20 deployment. But by last August, their 800 warheads had become more than 1,200. We still had none. Some freeze. At this time Soviet Defense Minister Ustinov announced "approximate parity of forces continues to exist." But the Soviets are still adding an average of three new warheads a week, and now have 1,300. These warheads can reach their targets in a matter of a few minutes. We still have none. So far, it seems that the Soviet definition of parity is a box score of 1,300 to nothing, in their favor.

So, together with our NATO allies, we decided in 1979 to deploy new weapons, beginning this year, as a deterrent to their SS-20's and as an incentive to the Soviet Union to meet us in serious arms control negotiations. We will begin that deployment late this year. At the same time, however, we're willing to cancel our program if the Soviets will dismantle theirs. This is what we've called a zero-zero plan. The Soviets are now at the negotiating table—and I think it's fair to say that without our planned deployments, they wouldn't be there.

Now, let's consider conventional forces. Since 1974, the United States has produced 3,050 tactical combat aircraft. By contrast, the Soviet Union has produced twice as many. When we look at attack submarines, the United States has produced 27 while the Soviet Union has produced 61. For armored vehicles, including tanks, we have produced 1,200 [11,200].[20] The Soviet Union has produced 54,000—nearly 5 to 1 in their favor. Finally, with artillery, we have produced 950 artillery and rocket launchers while the Soviets have produced more than 13,000—a staggering 14 to 1 ratio.

There was a time when we were able to offset superior Soviet numbers with higher quality. But today, they are building weapons as sophisticated and modern as our own. As the Soviets have increased their military power, they have been emboldened to extend that power. They are spreading their military influence in ways that can directly challenge our vital interests and those of our allies.

The following aerial photographs, most of them secret until now, illustrate this point in a crucial area very close to home: Central America and the Caribbean Basin. They are not dramatic photographs. But I think they help give you a better understanding of what I am talking about.

This Soviet intelligence collection facility less than 100 miles from our coast is the largest of its kind in the world. The acres and acres of antennae fields and intelligence monitors are targeted on key U.S. military installations and sensitive activities. The installation in Lourdes, Cuba is manned by 1,500 Soviet technicians. And the satellite ground station allows instant communications with Moscow. This 28-square-mile facility has grown by more than 60 percent in size and capability during the past decade.

In western Cuba, we see this military airfield and its complement of modern, Soviet-built MIG–23 aircraft. The Soviet Union uses this Cuban airfield for its own long-range reconnaissance missions. And earlier this month, two modern Soviet anti-submarine warfare aircraft began operating from it. During the past 2 years, the level of Soviet arms exports to Cuba can only be compared to the levels reached during the Cuban missile crisis 20 years ago.

This third photo, which is the only one in this series that has been previously made public, shows Soviet military hardware that has made its way to Central America. This airfield with its MI–8 helicopters, anti-aircraft guns, and protected fighter sites is one of a number of military facilities in Nicaragua which has received Soviet equipment funneled through Cuba, and reflects the massive military buildup going on in that country.

On the small island of Grenada, at the southern end of the Caribbean chain, the Cubans with Soviet financing and backing are in the process of building an airfield with a 10,000-foot runway. Grenada doesn't even have an air force. Who is it intended for? The Caribbean is a very important passage way for our international commerce and military lines of communication. More than half of all American oil imports now pass through the Caribbean. The rapid buildup of Grenada's military potential is unrelated to any conceivable threat to this island country of under 110,000 people and totally at odds with the pattern of other eastern Caribbean states, most of which are unarmed.

The Soviet-Cuban militarization of Grenada, in short, can only be seen as power projection into the region. And it is in this important economic and strategic area that we're trying to help the Governments of El Salvador, Costa Rica, Honduras, and others in their struggles for democracy against guerrillas supported through Cuba and Nicaragua.

These pictures only tell a small part of the story. I wish I could show you more without compromising our most sensitive intelligence sources and methods. But the Soviet Union is also supporting Cuban military forces in Angola and Ethiopia. They have bases in Ethiopia and South Yemen, near the Persian Gulf oil fields. They have taken over the port that we built at Cam Ranh Bay in Vietnam. And now for the first time in history, the Soviet Navy is a force to be reckoned with in the South Pacific.

Some people may still ask: Would the Soviets ever use their formidable military power? Well, again, can we afford to believe they won't? There is Afghanistan. And in Poland, the Soviets denied the will of the people and in so doing demonstrated to the world how their military power could also be used to intimidate.

The final fact is that the Soviet Union is acquiring what can only be considered an offensive military force. They have continued to build far more intercontinental ballistic missiles than they could possibly need simply to deter an attack. Their conventional forces are trained and equipped not so much to defend against an attack as they are to permit sudden surprise offenses of their own.

Our NATO allies have assumed a great defense burden, including the military draft in most countries. We're working with them and our other friends around the world to do more. Our defensive strategy means we need military forces that can move very quickly, forces that are trained and ready to respond to any emergency.

Every item in our defense program, our ships, our tanks, our planes, our funds for training and spare parts is intended for one all-important purpose, to keep the peace. Unfortunately, a decade of neglecting our military forces has called into question our ability to do that.

When I took office in January 1981, I was appalled by what I found: American planes that couldn't fly and American ships that couldn't sail for lack of spare parts and trained personnel and insufficient fuel and ammunition for essential training. The inevitable result of all this was poor morale in our armed forces, difficulty in recruiting the brightest young Americans to wear the uniform, and difficulty in convincing our most experienced military personnel to stay on.

There was a real question then about how well we could meet a crisis. And it was obvious that we had to begin a major modernization program to ensure we could deter aggression and preserve the peace in the years ahead.

We had to move immediately to improve the basic readiness and staying power of our conventional forces, so they could meet—and therefore help deter—a crisis. We had to make up for lost years of investment by moving forward with a long-term plan to prepare our forces to counter the military capabilities our adversaries were developing for the future.

I know that all of you want peace and so do I. I know too that many of you seriously believe that a nuclear freeze would further the cause of peace. But a freeze now would make us less, not more, secure and would raise, not reduce, the risks of war. It would be largely unverifiable and would seriously undercut our negotiations on arms reduction. It would reward the Soviets for their massive military buildup while preventing us from modernizing our aging and increasingly vulnerable forces. With their present margin of superiority, why should they agree to arms reductions knowing that we were prohibited from catching up?

Believe me, it wasn't pleasant for someone who had come to Washington determined to reduce government spending, but we had to move forward with the task of repairing our defenses or we would lose our ability to deter conflict now and in the future. We had to demonstrate to any adversary that aggression could not succeed, and that the only real solution was substantial, equitable, and effectively verifiable arms reduction—the kind we're working for right now in Geneva.

Thanks to your strong support, and bipartisan support from the Congress, we began to turn things around. Already, we're seeing some very encouraging results. Quality recruitment and retention are up, dramatically—more high school graduates are choosing military careers and more experienced career personnel are choosing to stay. Our men and women in uniform at last are getting the tools and training they need to do their jobs.

Ask around today, especially among our young people, and I think you will find a whole new attitude toward serving their country. This reflects more than just better pay, equipment, and leadership. You the American people have sent a signal to these young people that it is once again an honor to wear the uniform. That's not something you measure in a budget, but it's a very real part of our nation's strength.

It'll take us longer to build the kind of equipment we need to keep peace in the future, but we've made a good start.

We haven't built a new long-range bomber for 21 years. Now we're building the B-1. We hadn't launched one new strategic submarine for 17 years. Now we're building one Trident submarine a year. Our land-based missiles are increasingly threatened by the many huge, new Soviet ICBMs. We're determining how to solve that problem. At the same time, we're working in the START and INF negotiations with the goal of achieving deep reductions in the strategic and intermediate nuclear arsenals of both sides.

We have also begun the long-needed modernization of our conventional forces. The Army is getting its first new tank in 20 years. The Air Force is modernizing. We're rebuilding our Navy which shrank from about 1,000 ships in the late 1960's to 453 during the 1970's. Our nation needs a superior navy to support our military forces and vital interests overseas. We're now on the road to achieving a 600-ship navy and increasing the amphibious capabilities of our Marines who are now serving the cause of peace in Lebanon. And we're building a real capability to assist our friends in the vitally-important Indian Ocean and Persian Gulf region.

This adds up to a major effort, and it isn't cheap. It comes at a time when there are many other pressures on our budget, and when the American people have already had to make major sacrifices during the recession. But we must not be misled by those who would make defense once again the scapegoat of the Federal budget.

The fact is that in the past few decades we have seen a dramatic shift in how we spend the taxpayer's dollar. Back in 1955, payments to individuals took up only about 20 percent of the Federal budget. For nearly three decades, these payments steadily increased and this year will account for 49 percent of the budget. By contrast, in 1955, defense took up more than half of the Federal budget. By 1980, this spending had fallen to a low of 23 percent. Even with the increase that I am requesting this year, defense will still amount to only 28 percent of the budget.

The calls for cutting back the defense budget come in nice simple arithmetic. They're the same kind of talk that led the democracies to neglect their defenses in the 1930's and invited the tragedy of World War II. We must not let that grim chapter of history repeat itself through apathy or neglect.

This is why I'm speaking to you tonight—to urge you to tell your Senators and Congressmen that you know we must continue to restore our military strength. If we stop in midstream, we will send a signal of decline, of lessened will, to friends and adversaries alike. Free people must voluntarily, through open debate and democratic means, meet the challenge that totalitarians pose by compulsion. It's up to us, in our time, to choose and choose wisely between the hard but necessary task of preserving peace and freedom and the temptation to ignore our duty and blindly hope for the best while the enemies of freedom grow stonger day by day.

The solution is well within our grasp. But to reach it, there is simply no alternative but to continue this year, in this budget, to provide the resources we need to preserve the peace and guarantee our freedom.

Now, thus far tonight I have shared with you my thoughts on the problems of national security we must face together. My predecessors in the Oval Office have appeared before you on other occasions to describe the threat posed by Soviet power and have proposed steps to address that threat. But since the advent of nuclear weapons, those steps have been increasingly directed toward deterrence of aggression through the promise of retaliation. This approach to stability through offensive threat has worked. We and our allies have succeeded in preventing nuclear war for more than three decades. In recent months, however, my advisers, including in particular the Joint Chiefs of Staff, have underscored the necessity to break out of a future that relies solely on offensive retaliation for our security. Over the course of these discussions, I have become more and more deeply convinced that the human spirit must be capable of rising above dealing with other nations and human beings by threatening their existence. Feeling this way, I believe we must thoroughly examine every opportunity for reducing tensions, and for introducing greater stability into the strategic calculus on both sides.

One of the most important contributions we can make is, of course, to lower the level of all arms, and particularly nuclear arms. We are engaged right now in several negotiations with the Soviet Union to bring about a mutual reduction of weapons.

I will report to you a week from tomorrow my thoughts on that score. [21] But let me just say, I am totally committed to this course. If the Soviet Union will join with us in our effort to achieve major reduction, we will have succeeded in stabilizing the nuclear balance. Nevertheless, it will still be necessary to rely on the specter of retaliation, on mutual threat. And that is a sad commentary on the human condition. Wouldn't it be better to save lives than to avenge them? Are we not capable of demonstrating our peaceful intentions by applying all our abilities and our ingenuity to achieving a truly lasting stability?

I think we are. Indeed, we must. After careful consultation with my advisers including the Joint Chiefs of Staff, I believe there is a way. Let me share with you a vision of the future which offers hope. It is that we embark on a program to counter the awesome Soviet missile threat with measures that are defensive. Let us turn to the very strengths in technology that spawned our great industrial base, and that have given us the quality of life we enjoy today.

What if free people could live secure in the knowledge that their security did not rest upon the threat of instant U.S. retaliation to deter a Soviet attack, that we could intercept and destroy strategic ballistic missiles before they reached our own soil or that of our allies?

I know this is a formidable, technical task, one that may not be accomplished before the end of this century. Yet, current technology has attained a level of sophistication where it is reasonable for us to begin this effort. It will take years, probably decades of effort on many fronts. There will be failures and setbacks, just as there will be successes and breakthroughs. And as we proceed, we must remain constant in preserving the nuclear deterrent and maintaining a solid capability for flexible response.

But isn't it worth every investment necessary to free the world from the threat of nuclear war? We know it is. In the meantime, we will continue to pursue real reductions in nuclear arms, negotiating from a position of strength that can be assured only by modernizing our strategic forces.

At the same time, we must take steps to reduce the risk of a conventional military conflict escalating to nuclear war by improving our non-nuclear capabilities. America does possess—now—the technologies to attain very significant improvements in the effectiveness of our conventional, non-nuclear forces. Proceeding boldly with these new technologies, we can significantly reduce any incentive that the Soviet Union may have to threaten attack against the United States or its allies.

As we pursue our goal of defensive technologies, we recognize that our allies rely upon our strategic offensive power to deter attacks against them. Their vital interests and ours are inextricably linked. Their safety and ours are one. And no change in techonology can or will alter that reality. We must and shall continue to honor our commitments.

I clearly recognize that defensive systems have limitations and raise certain problems and ambiguities. If paired with offensive systems, they can be viewed as fostering an aggressive policy, and no one wants that.

But with these considerations firmly in mind, I call upon the scientific community in our country, those who gave us nuclear weapons, to turn their great talents now to the cause of mankind and world peace, to give us the means of rendering these nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete.

Tonight, consistent with our obligations of the ABM Treaty [22] and recognizing the need for closer consultation with our allies, I'm taking an important first step. I am directing a comprehensive and intensive effort to define a long-term research and development program to begin to achieve our ultimate goal of eliminating the threat posed by strategic nuclear missiles. This could pave the way for arms control measures to eliminate the weapons themselves. We seek neither military superiority nor political advantage. Our only purpose—one all people share—is to search for ways to reduce the danger of nuclear war.

My fellow Americans, tonight we're launching an effort which holds the promise of changing the course of human history. There will be risks, and results take time. But I believe we can do it. As we cross this threshold, I ask for your prayers and your support. Thank you. Good night. And God bless you.

Statement Issued by the White House, March 23, 1983 [23]

National Security Decision Directive on Ballistic Missile Defense Research and Development

Today the President issued a National Security Decision Directive addressing his intent to direct the development of an intensive effort to define a long term research and development program aimed at an ultimate goal of eliminating the threat posed by nuclear ballistic missiles as announced in his speech of March 23, 1983. [24]

The document directs the following:

It is my policy to take every opportunity to reduce world tensions and enhance stability. Our efforts to achieve significant reductions in strategic offensive forces and to eliminate LRINF land based missiles are one approach to that aim. However, it is my long range goal to go beyond this. I would like to decrease our reliance on the threat of retaliation by offensive nuclear weapons and to increase the contribution of defensive systems to our security and that of our allies. To begin to move us toward that goal, I have concluded that we should explore the possibility of using defensive capabilities to counter the threat posed by nuclear ballistic missiles.

I direct the development of an intensive effort to define a long term research and development program aimed at an ultimate goal of eliminating the threat posed by nuclear ballistic missiles. These actions will be carried out in a manner consistent with our obligations under the ABM Treaty and recognizing the need for close consultations with our allies.

In order to provide the necessary basis for this effort, I further direct a study be completed on a priority basis to assess the roles that ballistic missile defense could play in future security strategy of the United States and our allies. Among other items, the study will provide guidance necessary to develop research and development funding commitments for the FY 85 Departmental budgets and the accompanying Five-Year Defense Program (FYDP).

The Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs is assigned the responsibility to formulate detailed instructions for implementing this NSDD including organization, assignment of responsibilities, and completion dates.

Statement by the Chairman of the President's Commission on Strategic Forces (Scowcroft), April 11, 1983 [25]

Report of the Scowcroft Commission

I think, since you really have not had a chance to go over our report, [26] that it would be useful for me to take 5 minutes or so to outline some of its major elements as background for your questions.

It is a closely reasoned report, I hope. And, therefore, I would urge that you read it carefully. I will not pretend to cover all of it, but simply touch some of the highlights.

The report begins by outlining the central dilemma for us—of coping with Soviet

The statement was made at the outset of a press briefing held at the Old Executive Office Building beginning at 12:12 p.m. Those present included Commission members, John Deutch, Alexander M. [26] Report of the President's Commission on Strategic Forces, April 11, 1983.

expansionism, while avoiding the devastation of a nuclear war. It then goes on to discuss the nature and the requirements of deterrence and the manner in which arms control can make a contribution to that deterrence. It points out that the Soviets place great emphasis on their military forces, at least as a backdrop for their political designs.

For example, Soviet investment in ICBM forces underscores the importance, in their eyes, of the role that those forces play for them. Thus, since the deployment of the last U.S. ICBM—the Minuteman III—the Soviets have deployed the SS-17, the 18, and the 19—over 600 missiles of MX size or larger. And they are, now, in the process of testing two new ones.

Since the fundamental purpose of U.S. strategic forces is deterrence, it is vital for us to understand the importance of military power in the Soviet scheme of things. To maintain and enhance deterrence, the United States has been modernizing its strategic forces. The report discusses that modernization with emphasis, of course, on ICBM forces—which is at the heart of our current, national problems on strategic force modernization.

Our analysis has convinced us that this issue has come, in part, to be miscast. And our report recommends what we feel is a major, new departure. We are proposing new directions both in ICBM forces and in arms control. That new departure, fundamentally, is to integrate strategic force programs with arms control, and to move both in the direction of stability.

We would accomplish this through a three-part program. The first part would be the immediate deployment of something like a hundred MX missiles for a number of reasons, among which are the following.

First and certainly not least, to demonstrate U.S. national will and cohesion—we have now had four Presidents who have said that the MX is important, if not essential, to our national security. Failure to carry through with this program would hardly demonstrate to the Soviets that we have the will, which is an essential element of deterrence.

Next, in order to reduce the substantial imbalance in the capability of U.S. ICBM forces compared to those of the Soviet Union—the Soviets can, with their ICBM forces, put our forces and other critical targets at risk in a way that the United States cannot begin to match. This is an important element of instability.

But, very importantly, the MX is essential to induce the Soviets toward negotiation, especially negotiation on an arms control framework which would permit us, and encourage them, to move in the direction of greater stability.

For the longer run, the Commission proposes engineering design of a small, single-warhead missile—looking toward possible deployment in the early 1990's. We suggest a single-warhead missile in order to reduce the value of the target, making it unremunerative to attack and, thus, enhancing the stability of the force—and small in order to open up, to a maximum extent, the opportunities for survivable basing, almost certainly including mobile.

In order to provide the environment which will support the deployment of a small missile, a new departure in arms control is needed. Counting by launchers has, perversely, led us to the present structure of very high valued targets, large missiles with a number of warheads.

We must, therefore, turn to counting our forces on both sides by warheads, and not by launchers. After moving to count warheads, it would be, then, useful to cap or reduce the numbers sharply in order that a deployment of great numbers of small missiles would not be necessary.

This, in turn, gets us back to the MX, which is essential to induce the Soviets to negotiate away what is currently a favorable strategic position for them in ICBM forces, hopefully, to encourage them to move in the same strategic direction by making clear that their huge missiles in silos are a wasting asset.

For this, we believe that MX deployed in Minuteman silos is an adequate response at reasonable cost. It is true that, whatever the current survivability of Minuteman silos, they are becoming more vulnerable. We do propose a vigorous R&D program on silo hardening and, of course, would take advantage of any developments which result from that research and development, either with the MX or, conceivably, with the small missile.

The fundamental requirement for survivability of our ICBM force is as a hedge against a Soviet breakthrough in anti-submarine warfare, putting our submarine-launched ballistic missiles at risk. We do not see that on the horizon at the present time. And we are proposing the small missile in the longer run to enhance survivability of the ICBM force.

For the present, we believe that vulnerability is not so dominant a part of the overall problem as to require other, immediate steps. We believe that the Soviets must have some uncertainties about their operational capabilities, notwithstanding whatever their test accuracies indicate to them. But especially, we feel that there still is an important synergistic survivability between the ICBM forces and the bomber forces in that it is difficult, if not impossible, for the Soviets to attack both of them simultaneously.

That, in brief, is the outline of our recommendations. Few, if any, will consider our recommendations an optimal solution. If such were available, this Commission probably would not have been convened. We have tried to construct an approach which is different in kind, however, which promises a major, new departure for the United States in the direction of enhanced stability for our strategic forces and, hopefully, an approach which will permit a consensus to develop, allowing us to put the divisiveness of the past—both in arms control and in our strategic forces—behind us and allow us to move forward with a more common perspective in our efforts to preserve both peace and liberty.

Address by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger) Before the Aviation and Space Writers Association, Arlington, Virginia, April 11, 1983 [27]

Ballistic Missile Defense

I am delighted to be here this morning to speak before such a distinguished group of aviation and space experts. I imagine that you have been more than a little busy lately analyzing the proposal on ballistic missile defense that President Reagan put forward 2 weeks ago. [28] The President's initiative has created quite a bit of interest on the part of our allies, Congress, the defense community, the media, and within government. Some have been skeptical, others cautiously supportive, and some merely confused. This was not unexpected, nor should it be considered unusual. New ideas, particularly when they go against conventional wisdom, are often greeted with doubt, cynicism, or wild speculation.

I would like to talk this morning about the President's proposal that we develop strategic defense, and report why we think it is not only a realistic goal, but argue that, if obtained, it could reduce the fears and lift the hopes of all mankind. First, however, I would like to discuss what the President's proposal is not:

—It is not a hasty, ill-conceived scheme

—It is not a star wars fantasy

—It is not a quest for a first strike capability

—It is not a retreat to Fortress America

—It is not a substitute for deterrence or arms control

It is not a hasty ill-conceived scheme; indeed the vision of defending against nuclear attack and freeing us from the terror of nuclear weapons is one the President has held for many years. Before announcing this proposal the President held lengthy meetings with his top advisers—both civilian and military—on technical and policy matters. We all recognized that the search for strategic defense will not be without problems—technical, diplomatic, and political—but we all agreed with the President that the goal of strategic defense is so eminently desirable that we can and will find solutions to any problems that might develop along the way.

The quest for a system to defend against ballistic missile attack is not a star wars fantasy or a pipe dream, as some skeptics have suggested. While we are fully aware of the magnitude of this challenge, we have, understandably, great faith in our technical and scientific genius. Time and time again we have seen yesterday's science fiction become today's reality. Who would have believed in 1870 that the Nautilus, the self-sustaining undersea vessel Jules Verne described that year in 20,000 Leagues Under the Sea would become a reality by 1955? Who would have believed when we formed NASA in 1958 that we would have a man on the moon by 1969? Thirty years ago television sets were just coming on the market; today you can turn a dial and watch a continent away. Thirty years ago the prospect of converting the Sun's energy into usable power was considered preposterous. Last week a solar-powered airplane flew the English Channel. Twenty years ago an electronic computer filled an entire room and cost thousands of dollars; today one fits in the palm of a hand and costs less than $20.

This list could go on and on. What it tells us is that no one of us can say with certainty what can be accomplished—or what cannot—if and when we turn our creative talents to it. The fact that we do not yet know the answer should not be an excuse to delay the quest. As President Kennedy once said, "All this will not be finished in the first one hundred days. Nor will it be finished in the first one thousand days, nor in the life of this administration, nor even perhaps in our lifetime on this planet. But let us begin."

Some, wedded to strategic theories and literature of the past, have called the President's proposal the drive for a first strike capability that would upset superpower stability and provoke the Soviet Union. The President's proposal would in fact do just the opposite. An effective shield against ballistic missile attack would prevent aggression by neutralizing an aggressor's offensive capability. We know the Soviet Union has been working to achieve these same defensive systems for many years, and we hope that they will continue. A truly stable superpower relationship would be one in which both sides were protected from attack. Deterrence would be strengthened because we would remove an aggressor's capability to attack us rather than merely threaten retaliation after an attack has taken place. In the President's great phrase, we would protect our people, not avenge them. By developing defensive systems we would make the world more stable and secure by providing a shield against ballistic missile attack.

There has been some concern that by pursuing defensive systems we aim to cover only the United States with a protective shell and retreat from our alliance commitments. As the President said in his speech, we seek the capability to defend ourselves and our allies from the threat of military force. Our offensive weapons exist today for the sole purpose of deterring attack on the United States and our allies. Any defensive system we can develop would serve the same purpose—to deter attack against the United States and our allies by defending us all from ballistic missile attack.

Perhaps one reason for the skepticism with which some have greeted this initiative is due to misunderstanding. Many would have you believe that we seek to develop a single system which can intercept and defend flawlessly against all missiles and all attacks. We know there is no such "magic bullet." What we are trying to develop first is a defense network—a series of systems, not necessarily based on the same technology or physical principles—which taken together will provide a reliable defense against nuclear ballistic missiles.

The concept we will need to perfect is not dissimilar to the one we now employ to defend our fleet against tactical missile attack. The layered fleet defense system consists of F-14 fighters and Phoenix missiles at long ranges, the Aegis cruiser at medium range, and close in weapon systems. All are under control of computers which keep track of dozens of incoming missiles, and direct interceptors to destroy them. The ballistic missile defenses we seek to build must do these functions also, not against dozens of targets, but against thousands and at vastly greater ranges.

We are focussing on ballistic missile defense because since the 1960's, defense against these weapons has been the pacing factor in providing a complete and effective shield against nuclear attack. The speed of these missiles, and the fact that they can carry multiple warheads and penetration devices has confounded the ability of traditional antiballistic missile efforts to provide a capable defense. However, new technologies —in computer-aided detection and tracking, in defensive weaponry and in many other technologies—offer a means by which the ballistic missile may be defeated. In fact, one of the fundamental ingredients in ballistic missile defense, the "glue" that holds these systems together, is the ability to make millions of arithmetic operations and logical decisions per second in space, in the air or on the ground. Ten years ago, even five years ago, we did not have this capability. Today, the tremendous technological explosion in microelectronics makes possible physically small, highly capable, computers which allow us to consider BMD systems that orbit, that fly, or are ground mobile. This capability, coupled with other technologies such as directed energy weapons, "smart" missiles, and sophisticated sensors, allows us to think about developing the kind of ballistic missile defense the President called for in his recent speech. And if we are indeed able to master this technology and develop a defense against ballistic missiles, we should also be able to cope with the easier task of defending against the slower flying and other threats. We know the Soviets are working to develop defenses against the cruise missiles, for example. We can do no less for our people.

A second reason for concentrating initially on defending against ballistic missiles is the fact that those systems, because they can reach their targets so quickly, pose a special danger. We have recognized this already in our START and INF arms control efforts which place special emphasis on limiting ballistic missiles. If we are able to develop defenses which offer the promise of depriving ballistic missiles of their military utility, we may achieve what over a decade of negotiations has failed to do—the reduction and eventual dismantling of these systems, offering a safer and more stable environment in which to live.

We have entered into this effort with the full knowledge that we are embarked on a long-term effort that may take many years and may depend ultimately on technologies we have not yet developed. That is why, while we look with hope to the future, we must also focus on the present. As the President indicated, we must continue, for the interim, to rely on the offensive arm of deterrence to preserve the peace. Deterrence through a credible retaliatory capability has worked for nearly 40 years, and, there is every reason to believe that this policy will continue to prevent aggression against ourselves and our allies. We also must—and will—continue to pursue reductions in nuclear arms, and to seek agreements which are balanced, equal and verifiable. But it is important to remember that both deterrence and arms reductions require that we modernize our nuclear forces.

As a result of over a decade of relative U.S. military neglect coupled with two decades of Soviet major strategic and other force expansion, we are now confronted by significant strategic imbalances. The strategic modernization program which the President announced in October 1981 [29] provides a balanced and prudent approach to redressing the strategic imbalance and strengthening our deterrent. The proposal which the President will soon send to the Congress for modernizing our land-based missile force represents an important element of our program—and we urge the Congress to approve it. In the area of intermediate-range nuclear forces, the NATO program to begin deployment of ground-launched cruise missiles and Pershing IIs later this year is on schedule and provides a stable counter to the unwarranted creation, and subsequent massive expansion, of the Soviet SS–20 force.

Secondly, it is unrealistic to believe that the Soviet Union will ever agree to stability at lower levels of arms unless its leaders are first persuaded that their quest for superiority is unachievable. Only when the Soviet leaders are convinced beyond doubt that we are truly committed to maintaining our deterrent strength will they have any incentive to negotiate seriously on arms reductions. We believe our strategic and INF modernization programs provide the Soviets strong incentives for meaningful, balanced, and mutual force reductions. The fact that they are now negotiating with us on these deep reductions—which in prior years they refused to do—is strong evidence that, despite Soviet rhetoric, our approach is sound.

But if we once again terminate unilaterally our efforts to modernize and strengthen our own forces, we will never achieve the stability and mutual reductions we Americans so strongly desire. Indeed we will have removed all incentives for the Soviets even to stay at the negotiating table. Thus, our programs not only bolster our ability to deter war, they also provide the necessary incentive to the Soviets to negotiate agreements that could dismantle the threat to peace and to our security.

We also need to continue, along with our allies, to maintain and improve our defense against conventional attack. We will need to have a strong conventional defense even if our efforts to develop new defenses against nuclear attack are achieved. But as we strive to develop new technologies for nuclear defense, we and our allies must, as the President stated, exploit advanced technology to provide for increased effectiveness of our conventional forces too.

In conclusion, let me underscore the fact that the President's new initiative is wholly consistent with our current policies on deterrence and arms control. The offensive arm of deterrence will allow us to protect ourselves and our allies while we work on the new initiatives. It will allow a proper transition to a world in which we can rely on defense rather than on threats of retaliation to deter attack. It will encourage arms control efforts which will make that transition easier. And arms control will make that future world a safer, more secure, and happier place in which to live.

Twenty years ago this spring, President Kennedy gave this answer to those who refused to accept the prospect that we have the ability to shape our future and manage our own destiny. "Our problems are man-made, therefore they can be solved by man. And man can be as big as he wants. Man's reason and spirit have often solved the seemingly unsolvable, and we believe they can do it again." How can we accept less?

Statement by President Reagan, April 19, 1983 [30]

Endorsement of the Recommendations of the President's Commission on Strategic Forces

Later today, I'll send a report to the Congress which endorses the recommendations of the Bipartisan Commission on Strategic Forces, and urges prompt Congressional action and support. [31]

This distinguished panel's recommendations are important for two reasons: The actions they propose will preserve stable deterrence and thus protect the peace. And they will add solid incentives and credibility to our efforts to negotiate arms reductions that can pave the way to a more secure and peaceful future.

On the 23d of March, I spoke to the American people about our program for strengthening this nation's security and that of our allies and announced a long-term research effort to reduce, some day, the threat posed by nuclear ballistic missiles. [32]

A week later in Los Angeles, I expanded our efforts to limit and reduce this danger through reliable, verifiable and stabilizing arms control agreements. [33]

Both of these paths lead to a common goal: Preventing conflict, reducing the risk of war and safeguarding the peace.

Every American President has accepted this crucial objective as his most basic responsibility. But preserving the peace requires more than wishful thinking and vague good intentions. Concrete, positive action is required to free the world from the spectre of nuclear conflict. And that's why we will continue to work relentlessly to achieve nuclear stability at the lowest possible levels. Our words, policies and actions all make clear to the world our country's deeply held conviction that nuclear war on any scale would be a tragedy of unparalleled scope.

Time and again, America has exercised unilateral restraint, good will and a sincere commitment to effective arms control. Unfortunately, these actions alone have not yet made us truly safer and they haven't reduced the danger of nuclear war. Over the past year, for example, the Soviets have deployed over 1,200 intercontinental ballistic missile warheads, more than the entire Peacekeeper program.

The history of American involvement in arms control shows us what works and what doesn't work. The fact is that in the past our one-sided restraint and good will failed to promote similar restraint and good will from the Soviet Union. They also failed to produce meaningful arms control. But history also teaches us that when the United States has shown the resolve to remain strong, stabilizing arms control can be achieved.

In the late sixties, we made a major effort to negotiate an anti-ballistic missile treaty with the Soviet Union. After the Soviet leadership demonstrated a clear lack of interest, the Congress agreed to fund an anti-ballistic missile building program. And the result was predictable.

Once the Soviets knew we were going ahead, they came to the negotiating table and we negotiated a treaty. It was formally adopted and remains in force today.

Obviously, the best way to nuclear stability and a lasting peace is through negotiations. And this is the course that we've set. And if we demonstrate our resolve, it can lead to success.

It was against this background that I established a Bipartisan Commission on Strategic Forces last January, and directed it to review the strategic program for U.S. forces with particular emphasis on intercontinental ballistic missile systems and their basing.

A distinguished bipartisan panel of Americans who served on the Commission, and those who served as senior counselors, have performed a great service to their country, and we all owe them a debt of gratitude.

Brent Scowcroft, the Commission's Chairman, other Commission members, Harold Brown, and the senior consultants are here today. I want to express my appreciation to you all for a tough job extraordinarily well done.

In the finest spirit of bipartisanship, the Commission unanimously arrived at clear, important recommendations on some of the most difficult issues of our time. During the past three months, the Commission held dozens of formal meetings and numerous small conferences. They talked to over 200 technical experts, and consulted closely with the Congress.

The Commission members sought a common objective: to achieve a greater degree of national consensus concerning our approach to strategic force modernization and arms control.

As the Constitution's [34] report concludes, "If we come to see ourselves in dealing with these issues, not as political partisans or as crusaders for one specific solution to a part of this complex set of problems, but rather as citizens of a great nation with the humbling obligation to persevere in the long-run task of preserving both peace and liberty for the world, a common perspective may finally be found."

Well these words guided the work of the Commission. It is my fervent hope that they will guide all of us as we work toward the solution of what has been a difficult and lengthy issue.

The Commission has completed its work and last week submitted its report to me. It was immediately released, as you know, to the public.

After reviewing the report, I met with the National Security Council. They endorsed the Commission's recommendations as do all the members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. And so do I.

First, the Commission urges us to continue the strategic modernization program which I announced in October of 1981. It reaffirms that the need remains for improvements in the command, control, and communications of our strategic forces, and continuation of our bomber, submarine, and cruise missile program.

Second, the Commission urges modernization of our ICBM forces. We should immediately proceed to develop and produce the "Peacekeeper" missile and deploy 100 in existing Minuteman silos near Warren Air Force Base in Wyoming.

At the same time, the Commission recommends that we begin engineering the design for a small, single-warhead missile. If strategic and technical considerations warrant, this missile could be ready for deployment in the early 1990's.

Incidentally, this modernization program will save about $1.5 billion in 1984 and even more than that in each of the next 2 years. Third, the Commission recommends major research efforts in strategic defense and a thorough research program of hardening, making our land-based missile systems more secure.

This modernization effort is the final component of our comprehensive, strategic program. It will mean a safer, more secure America. And it will provide clear evidence to the Soviet Union that it is in their best interest to negotiate with us in good faith and with seriousness of purpose.

That adds up to an important incentive for both arms control and deterrence, for peace and security now and far into the future. Finally, the Commission underscores the need for ambitious arms control negotiations, negotiations that would lead to agreements that are balanced, promote stability in time of crisis and result in meaningful, verifiable reductions.

These are precisely the objectives of our arms control proposals now on the table in Geneva. These are—I want to reemphasize that we're in Geneva seeking equitable, reliable agreements that would bring real reductions.

So, the task before us is to demonstrate our resolve, our national will and our good faith. That's absolutely essential both for maintaining an effective deterrent and for achieving successful arms reductions. Make no mistake, unless we modernize our land-based missile systems, the Soviet Union will have no real reason to negotiate meaningful reductions. If we fail to act, we cannot reasonably expect an acceptable outcome in our arms control negotiations. And we will also weaken the deterrent posture that has preserved the peace for more than a generation.

Therefore, I urge the Congress to join me now in supporting this bipartisan program to pursue arms control agreements that promote stability to meet the needs of our ICBM force today and to move to a more stable ICBM structure in the future. To follow up on the Commission's recommendations, I have asked Brent Scowcroft in his capacity as chairman to keep me closely advised as this issue moves toward resolution, particularly as it relates to arms control.

For more than a decade, each of four administrations made proposals for arms control and modernization. Unfortunately, each became embroiled in political controversy. The members of the Commission, the Secretary of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and I have all had to take fresh looks at our previous positions. But despite the wide range of views these groups have held in the past, we now have a program that has our unanimous support. Support by the Congress and the American people for this consensus will unite us in our common search for ways to strengthen our national security, reduce the risk of war, and ultimately reduce the level of nuclear weapons. We can no longer afford to delay. The time to act is now.

Thank you all very much for being here, and again I thank the Commission for their fine work. (Applause)

Letter From President Reagan to the Speaker of the House of Representatives (O'Neill), April 19, 1983 [35]

Recommendations of the President's Commission on Strategic Forces

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On January 3, 1983, I established a bipartisan Commission to respond to the issues raised by the Congress regarding the Peacekeeper missile, possible alternatives to the Peacekeeper, and possible alternative ICBM basing modes. The report, which the Commission submitted to me, was delivered to you last week. Attached is a classified report [36] prepared by the Department of Defense submitted pursuant to the provisions of subsection (7) of Title V of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1983, enacted as part of P.L. 97-377. The attached document addresses the issues set out in subsection (7).

I am pleased to report to you that the distinguished group of Americans who served on the Commission have unanimously agreed on a package of actions, which I strongly support, and on which Secretary Weinberger, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Secretary Shultz and the National Security Council have joined with me in supporting. They are as follows:

(1) Improve as a first priority the command, control, and communications for our strategic forces; continue with high priority the Trident submarine and D-5 missile programs; and continue the bomber and air-launched cruise missile efforts as planned.

(2) Proceed with the immediate production of the Peacekeeper missile, and deployment of 100 such missiles in existing Minuteman silos in the Francis E. Warren AFB area, which I propose as the alternative basing plan required by P.L. 97-377. Specifically, the First 50 missiles will replace the Minuteman missiles in the 400th Strategic Missile Squadron (SMS). In turn, the second 50 will replace the Minuteman missiles in the 319th SMS. I have chosen Francis E. Warren AFB because the existing silos at that location offer the best operational considerations.

(3) Commence engineering design of a small, single warhead ICBM. If strategic and technical considerations warrant, such a missile could be ready for full-scale development in 1987 and potential deployment in the early 1990's.

(4) Expand research into, and undertake the most rigorous examination of, all forms of defense against ballistic missiles. This includes work on penetration aids.

(5) Undertake a specific program to resolve uncertainties regarding silo and shelter hardness, a study of fratricide effects, and investigation of different types of land-based vehicles and launchers, particularly hardened vehicles.

[36] The report does not accompany the source text.

Finally, I reconfirm that I am fully committed to continue to pursue ambitious and objective arms reduction negotiations with a goal of agreements that are balanced, promote stability in time of crisis, constitute meaningful force reductions, and are verifiable. As you know, our proposals to secure reductions of all types of weapons are before the Soviets in many forums.

I urge the Congress to join me now in this bipartisan effort to settle on a modernization plan for our strategic forces. For more than a decade, each of four administrations has made proposals for arms control and modernization that have become embroiled in political controversy.

Balancing a number of factors, the members of the Commission, the Secretary of Defense, Joint Chiefs of Staff, and I have all had to take fresh looks at our previous positions. Despite the range of views these groups have held in the past, we are presenting to you a unanimous view on this vital issue. Your support for the consensus can unite us in taking a major step forward in our common search for ways to ensure national security.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN

Prepared Statement by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger) Before the House Armed Services Committee, April 20, 1983 [37]

Basing of the MX Missile System

Mr. Chairman, thank you for this opportunity to discuss the President's plan for revitalizing the ICBM leg of our Strategic Triad.

This is not my first visit to talk about the need to update our ICBM forces. Nor am I the first Secretary of Defense to raise these issues before this distinguished committee. Four Presidents, six Secretaries of Defense, and a majority of the members in several sessions of Congress all have concluded that we need to modernize our ICBM force.

The members of the President's Commission on Strategic Forces have done us all a great service, and not just because they have presented an eminently reasonable, and achievable, proposal for modernizing our ICBMs. They have also reminded us that there is a long-standing, bipartisan consensus about three facts. First, that the United States pursues peace and protects its freedom and the freedom of its allies through a joint strategy of deterrence and arms control. Second, that deterrence depends on retaining a multiplicity, and more specifically a Triad, of strategic forces, including intercontinental ballistic missiles. And third, that in view of actions taken by the Soviet Union over the last decade and a half, we must take steps now to ensure the effectiveness of that Triad and in so doing not only maintain deterrence but also improve the prospects for genuine, mutual, and significant reductions in nuclear weapons.

Before discussing the President's recommendation for modernizing the ICBM force, let me review the reasoning that lies behind this consensus about American strategic policy.

Since the end of World War II and the dawn of the atomic age, the United States has maintained peace and preserved its freedom, and that of its allies, by means of an inherently defensive policy—deterrence. This policy, and the strategic capability to back it up, serves as a clear indication to potential aggressors that the West has the will and the means necessary to resist aggression. By maintaining the ability to retaliate against a potential aggressor in such a manner that the costs we will exact will exceed substantially any gains he might hope to achieve through aggression, we can prevent any aggressor from coming to believe that he could profit from or win a nuclear war.

We, for our part, are under no illusions about the consequences of nuclear war. We know there would be no winners in such an exchange. But this recognition on our part is not enough to maintain deterrence. The Soviet leadership must understand this as well. The President's Commission on Strategic Forces made this point eloquently in their report.

> "Deterrence is not an abstract notion amenable to simple quantification. Still less is it a mirror image of what would deter ourselves. Deterrence is the set of beliefs in the minds of the Soviet leaders, given their own values and attitudes, about our capabilities and our will. It requires us to determine, as best we can, what would deter them from considering aggression, even in a crisis—not to determine what would deter us."

Unlike the United States, the Soviet Union seems to believe that under certain circumstances a nuclear war could be fought and won. Today we see that the number, the explosive power, and the accuracy of Soviet nuclear weapons are far greater than would be needed simply to deter attack. In addition, the Soviets have developed a refiring capability for some of their larger ICBMs, which could allow them to reload their delivery systems several times. They have given us indications that they think they could fight a protracted war by hardening their silos and protecting key targets with elaborate air defenses. Their writings, military doctrine, and exercises all emphasize the kind of nuclear warfighting policy we in the United States have rejected—and which we must deter. We must, therefore, make sure that the Soviet leadership, in calculating the risks of aggression, recognizes that an effective American response exists, and understands that, consequently, there can be no circumstance where the initiation of a war at any level would make sense.

To this end, we have maintained over the last two decades a strong and interdependent force, known as the Triad, which consists of land-based intercontinental ballistic missiles, sea-based ballistic missiles, and manned strategic bombers. This multiplicity of forces provides three significant benefits.

First, each of the strategic components of the Triad acts in concert with the others to complicate Soviet planning, making it more difficult for the Soviet Union not only to plan and execute a successful attack but also to defend against retaliation.

Second, each of the legs of the Triad acts as a hedge against a possible technological break-through that could threaten the viability of any single strategic system. By maintaining a Triad we force the Soviet Union to disperse their resources among three components, preventing them from concentrating their considerable resources on defeating two or only one U.S. strategic system.

Finally, only a Triad of three unique systems can provide us with all the elements necessary to provide a strong, secure deterrent. The strengths of each system not only complement the strengths of the other two but also compensate for their weaknesses. To deter successfully all types of nuclear attack, our forces as a whole must possess a number of characteristics and capabilities—including survivability, prompt response, mission flexibility and sufficient accuracy and warhead yield to retaliate against hardened Soviet military targets. No single weapons system can incorporate all of these capabilities. Submarines are less vulnerable, but less accurate. Bombers are accurate, and retrievable, but are much slower. ICBMs are easier to command and control, faster, and more accurate, but they are more vulnerable than submarines and, once launched, irretrievable. But all three systems together can incorporate all those elements necessary to deter against all types of attack.

For many years it was our good fortune to possess a Triad whose effectiveness could be assured well into the future. Unhappily, due to the massive, and largely unmatched, strategic build up that the Soviets have sustained since the 1960s, those days are gone. That build up has created substantial vulnerabilities in our strategic Triad which in turn have altered the strategic balance and reduced the effectiveness of our deterrent capability.

Over the past 2 years the President has instituted, and the Congress has supported, a number of initiatives to rectify the Triad deficiencies this build up has created, including production of the Trident submarine and development of a new, more capable SLBM, the D-5; production of the air-launched cruise missile, development of the B-1B and "Stealth" bombers; improvements in the U.S.-Canadian Air Defense network; and improvements in the effectiveness and reliability of our command, control, communications and attack warning capabilities. I know this committee shares our conviction that such a strategic modernization program is vital to preserving deterrence and enhancing the prospects for arms reduction.

But one very serious weakness in our Triad has yet to be resolved—the modernization of the ICBM force. The United States made a conscious choice during the 1970s to restrict its nuclear weapons developments so as not to present the Soviet Union with a first strike threat. However, the Soviets showed no such restraint. During the 1970s the Soviet Union deployed more than 600 powerful SS-18 and SS-19 ICBMs with nearly 5,000 highly accurate warheads; at the same time they hardened their missile silos and key command and control facilities to resist attack. These Soviet developments have simultaneously endangered the survivability of our ICBM force, and substantially reduced the retaliatory effectiveness which lies at the heart of our strategy of deterrence.

Without a viable ICBM force our Triad would lose several qualities that are crucial to deterrence: extremely high peacetime readiness rates, rapid and reliable communications with command authorities, and prompt counter military capability.

But, even more important, indeed at the heart of the current U.S.-Soviet strategic force imbalance, is the Soviet monopoly of prompt hard target kill capability. This gives them a twofold advantage over the United States. First, it enables the Soviets to launch a very high confidence first strike attack on our land-based ICBM, while expending only one third of their ICBM force in the process. The large store of remaining ICBMs would then enable them to divert weapons to other essential targets in a first-strike attack and still maintain a large and effective reserve force to conduct follow-on attacks. Second, the fact that we lack a prompt retaliatory capability against very hard targets allows Soviet planners to consider the possibility that, for the crucial first few hours of a nuclear conflict, the bulk of their ICBM force and supporting command and control structure would remain largely immune to U.S. retaliation. This would eliminate one of the major sources of uncertainty that is such an important element of deterrence—the unpredictable effects of U.S. retaliation on Soviet war plans. Without this crucial uncertainty exerting an influence on Soviet war planners, their confidence in their ability to fight and win a nuclear war is reinforced.

This development is too dangerous to be allowed to continue unchallenged. If we do nothing, we will face the very real danger that the Soviets could at some point come to believe that they could use, or blackmail us by threatening to use, nuclear forces to gain their military or political ends.

Because the problems of the ICBM leg of the Triad are essentially two-fold—retaliatory effectiveness and survivability—we must seek a solution that answers both concerns. Last November the Administration recommended deploying the Peacekeeper missile in a closely spaced basing mode, which would take advantage of the fratricide phenomenon produced by attacks on closely spaced super-hardened ICBM silos. Congress, as you know, directed us to study further the question of basing and deployment. To fulfill this requirement, the President established an independent, bipartisan Commission on Strategic Forces made up of distinguished experts and former Government officials and chaired by former National Security Advisor, Brent Scowcroft. The President directed the Commission to examine the broad range of strategic modernization issues including basing alternatives to CSB, ICBM alternatives to the Peacekeeper, and air- and sea-based alternatives to a modernized land-based ICBM force. Over the last several months the Commission thoroughly studied these alternatives and last week presented its report to the President; a report that, I think all will agree, equals in every respect the expectations of excellence that such a distinguished body of experts naturally engenders. It is a report that has won the strong support of the President, his National Security Advisor, the Joint Chiefs and me. In addition to endorsing the President's strategic modernization program, the report addresses the two weaknesses of the ICBM leg in a phased approach.

To solve the problem of retaliatory effectiveness the plan calls for a limited deployment of 100 Peacekeeper missiles in Minuteman silos which will reestablish the hard target capability necessary to maintain deterrence. By deploying the Peacekeeper missile we will immensely complicate any attack the Soviets might plan and, by threatening their remaining ICBM force, decrease their confidence that an attack might succeed. As the President's Commission points out "Soviet planners would have to account for the possibility that Peacekeeper missiles would be available for use and thus they would help deter such attacks." Thus the lack of retaliatory effectiveness in our current ICBM force is a relatively easy weakness to overcome and the Peacekeeper can begin to accomplish this in 1986 and finish the job in 1989.

The President's modernization plan also spells out an approach to enhancing survivability. However, because this aspect of the problem is more complicated, the solution is necessarily more difficult. I can think of few national security issues that have been so intensively and exhaustively examined as Peacekeeper basing. The search for a survivable basing mode has preoccupied political leaders of both parties, as well as the American people for nearly a decade. Although we frequently have embraced different solutions to this problem, we all, nevertheless, shared the belief that if we looked long and hard enough, a single, perfect solution would be revealed.

By now it is clear that this was an illusion. As the Commission noted, " . . . by trying to solve all ICBM tasks with a single weapon and a single basing mode in the fact of the trends in technology, we have made the problem of modernizing the ICBM force so complex as to be virtually insoluble." Or, in the words of Voltaire, sometimes, " . . . the best is the enemy of the good."

With the Peacekeeper missile deployed in Minuteman silos, we will restore our retaliatory capability. However, for the near term, we must rely on the interaction of the Triad legs to provide some degree of ICBM survivability. The point here, to quote the Commission report once again, is that "whereas it is highly desirable that each component of the strategic forces be survivable when it is viewed separately, it makes a major contribution to deterrence even if this survivability depends in a substantial measure on the existence of one of the other components of the force." With respect to the longer-term, the President's ICBM modernization plan will achieve survivability through an extended, two-step process: development of a new small missile, and research and development on mobility, silo hardening, ballistic missile defense, and deep underground basing.

Just as there are significant advantages to diversity among the Triad forces, there might also be significant advantages to diversity within the ICBM force. By deploying different types of ICBMS—each with different capabilities—and basing them in dissimilar configurations, the independent survivability of the ICBM force as a whole might be dramatically improved, while its flexibility is increased.

Specifically, by deploying the Peacekeeper we will quickly provide the ICBM force with the retaliatory hard target capability necessary to maintain deterrence. The Peacekeeper's throw-weight also gives us sufficient payload flexibility to maintain retaliatory effectiveness even if the Soviets were to harden their strategic assets even further, or violate the ABM Treaty by rapidly and massively increasing their ballistic missile defense deployments. By deploying a new small missile we would add to the flexibility and overall capability of the ICBM force while providing basing options, such as mobility, that are not feasible with larger missiles. And by deploying the ICBM force in a range of dissimilar basing modes, we improve the survivability of our entire ICBM force by driving the Soviet offensive force structure in opposite and counterproductive directions. That is, a force structure designed to effectively attack one type of basing mode may be ill suited to attack a different basing mode.

As mentioned earlier, the President's plan includes vigorous research on new techniques for hardening silos and shelters, on different types of land-based vehicles and launchers, including hardened vehicles, on ballistic missile defense and deep underground basing, and on the phenomenon of fratricide, that is, destruction of an attacking warhead by the explosive effects of another. By supporting such diversity, the President's plan retains—and even enhances—our options for a changing strategic environment.

But the impact of the President's ICBM modernization plan extends beyond the world of nuclear deterrence. It also will have a significant impact on our ability to meet our commitments to our friends and allies. One important effect could be on the essential NATO INF modernization program. Scheduled to begin late this year, this program is necessary to counter the growing European strategic imbalance resulting from the persistent Soviet build up of its SS-20 intermediate range missile force. Many of our NATO allies are watching the decision on the deployment of the Peacekeeper very closely. Deployment of a modern land-based missile system in this country is necessary to maintain the effectiveness of the U.S. strategic deterrent, just as ending the present imbalance in Europe—either through arms reduction or deployment of modern intermediate range nuclear forces in Europe—is essential to keeping our allies securely linked to the U.S. strategic umbrella. Failure to deploy Peacekeeper could not only undercut the ability of key allied governments to muster and hold the political support necessary to back Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missile deployments in their countries but also be seen as undercutting America's nuclear umbrella for NATO.

But the President's plan also has a wider, more long-term impact. The peacetime, day-to-day decisions that collectively make up the behavior of the United States, the Soviet Union and all other nations are influenced by perceptions of the U.S.-Soviet strategic balance. The greater the imbalance, the more conscious we become of the limits to our options in international affairs and the greater the chance that we might be forced to compromise our interests to avoid crises that might overburden our capacity to deter conflict. In the same vein, the greater the imbalance, the greater the tendency of the Soviet Union to embrace ever more ambitious definitions of what constitute legitimate Soviet interests; the greater their tendency to view the risks of crises as an acceptable price to pay for the satisfaction of their political aims. The behaviot of other nations is affected by perceptions of the strategic balance too. The greater the imbalance, the greater the tendency to view Soviet aims as interests to be accommodated; the greater, also, their tendency to view U.S. aims as interests to be ignored or challenged.

Today, we are confronted with just such a strategic imbalance; an imbalance that, in the face of the continued enhancement of Soviet power, will only worsen if we do nothing to counter it. There are many things we can do to reestablish a strategic balance, some of which, as I mentioned eariler, we are doing already. However, if we do not modernize the ICBM leg of the Triad, and maintain those important capabilities unique to the ICBM, restoration of a strategic balance will not be possible. As my predecessor, Harold Brown, wrote recently: " . . . we said in the early 1970's that we would modernize with a new missile in the late 1970's. In the mid-1970's we said that we would do so in the early 1980's, and in the late 1970's that we would in the mid-1980's. We have failed so far to do any of those things, even while the Soviets were deploying over 600 new ICBMs, each with a payload equal to or greater than that of MX, and with accuracies now matching those of the most accurate U.S. ICBMs.

"To say that the United States will modernize in the early 1990's with a small single-warhead missile will just not be believable. The Soviets would be justified in calculating that any new U.S. ICBM system will be aborted by some combination of environmental, doctrinal, fiscal, and political problems."

Finally, there is the important consideration of arms control. While a strong and viable deterrent is essential to the maintenance of peace, our search for a durable foundation that can support a lasting peace must also incorporate significant and verifiable reductions in the size and destructive potential of existing nuclear arsenals. The President's ICBM modernization plan is fully consistent with, in fact, necessary to, such arms reductions. As you are all aware, the President has proposed a strategic arms reduction proposal, START, which would reduce by one third the overall size of both sides' deployed ballistic missile warheads, with even greater reductions in those weapons systems that are potentially the most destabilizing—land-based ballistic missiles. Whether the President's START proposal is successful will, in large measure, depend on Soviet perceptions of the nation's determination to maintain its deterrent capability in the face of the persistent growth of Soviet military power. Because the ICBM modernization plan is essential to our deterrence capability, the Soviets will undoubtedly perceive this nation's decision on whether to support it a litmus test of the extent of that determination.

If the American people and its Congress give their support, the Soviet Union will come to the realization that the United States understands the current strategic realities and fully intends to meet the national security obligations these realities impose. By reinforcing this perception of American determination, vigorous ICBM modernization will discourage the notion that a continuation of the Soviet arms build up will afford the Soviet Union any strategic advantage and encourage Soviet cooperation in bringing strategic arms under control. Conversely, failure to modernize will serve only to foster a Soviet belief in the soundness of their policy of seeking unilateral strategic advantage through the continued deployment of ever more powerful weapons in ever greater numbers.

Until this issue is clearly resolved in favor of a modernized ICBM force, we can expect little cooperation from the Soviet Union in Geneva. We have learned the hard way that the Soviet Union is impressed not by self-restraint, but by determination. For the first time they have proved willing to sit down at the negotiating table to discuss arms reduction; let us give them the incentive to stay there and reach fair, equitable, and verifiable agreements.

Let me make one final point about the centrality of our ICBM modernization plan to arms control. This Administration has sought to move away from arms control agreements that confine their restrictions to such limited measures of strategic capability as launchers and missiles, and emphasized instead those elements of strategic capability that threaten to upset stability. In this connection, I was pleased to note that the Commission report echoed this Administration's focus on warhead and throw-weight reductions in the START negotiations.

The President's modernization plan supports this concern with stability by holding out the promise, over the long-term, of channeling ICBM forces into more stable directions. Such stability can be enhanced by deployments that distribute the total number of warheads contained in the ICBM forces over a larger number of smaller missiles, thereby reducing the target value of individual ICBMs. In reducing the value of individual strategic assets, we reduce the attack incentive of a potential aggressor. If this promise is to be realized, we must pursue the two-step process provided by the President's plan.

First, we must deploy the Peacekeeper missile to end the current, destabilizing advantage the Soviet Union enjoys in critical prompt hard target capability. The Soviets will not voluntarily give up their current strategic advantage. If we do not take this first step, they will have no incentive to move toward ICBM deployments that are more stabilizing. Deployment of the Peacekeeper will act as a necessary foundation and catalyst for a restructuring of U.S. and Soviet ICBM forces.

Second, we must vigorously pursue small, single warhead missile technology and operational concepts to determine the technical, operational and fiscal feasibility of moving to an ICBM structure that increases the emphasis on the deployment of ICBMs that individually are of less value as targets.

The report issued by the President's Commission reflects the dedication and patriotism with which this bipartisan group of distinguished Americans responded to the task given them. Let me end, then, by quoting from the end of their report:

"If we can begin to see ourselves, in dealing with these issues, not as political partisans or as crusaders for one specific solution to a part of this complex set of problems, but rather as citizens of a great nation with the humbling obligation to persevere in the long-run task of preserving both peace and liberty for the world, a common perspective may finally be found."

Prepared Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the Senate Armed Services Committee, April 20, 1983 [38]

Modernizing U.S. Strategic Forces

Thank you. Mr. Chairman, distinguished members of this committee.

I am very pleased to have a chance to be here, along with Secretary Weinberger, to explain the importance of the President's proposals for modernizing our strategic forces.

First of all, I want to say, and join others, that we all owe a great debt to Brent Scowcroft and his colleagues on the President's Commission on Strategic Forces. They have given us a thorough, thoughtful, and invaluable analysis.

They brought to their task expertise and experience. They also brought with them the conviction that a matter so fundamental as our strategic forces, the backbone of our military strength, must be addressed in a spirit of bipartisan cooperation. I think there is a lesson, as Senator Jackson pointed out, here for all of us.

The question of how to modernize our strategic forces has been hotly debated for years now. The time has come to resolve it. As the Commission has shown us, it can only be accomplished if Americans of both parties work together with the attitude that we are partners in a common enterprise. I know President Reagan is eager to work with the Congress in that spirit.

I defer to Secretary Weinberger on the military considerations that underlie the President's program. I want to address myself, as you suggested, Mr. Chairman, to two key points:

First, modernization of our strategic forces, and in particular of our ICBM forces, is of critical importance to our foreign policy;

And second, the President's program is not only consistent with, but indeed advances, the important national objective of strategic arms control and reduction.

FOREIGN POLICY AND THE STRATEGIC BALANCE

The central goal of our national security policy is deterrence of war and maintenance of the strategic balance is a necessary condition for that deterrence. But the strategic balance also shapes to an important degree the global environment in which the United States pursues its foreign policy objectives. Therefore, decisions on major strategic weapons systems can have profound political as well as military consequences.

As Secretary of State, I am acutely conscious of the strength or weakness of American power, because it has a direct impact on our ability to achieve our goals. As a crucial determinant of relative strength, the strategic balance is a key indicator of relative influence.

Perceptions of the strategic balance are bound to influence the judgments not only of our adversaries, but also of our allies and friends around the world who rely on us. As leader of the democratic nations, we have an inescapable responsibility to maintain this pillar of the military balance, which only we can maintain.

Our determination to do so is an important signal of our resolve. Our performance of this responsibility is absolutely essential to sustaining the confidence of allies and friends and maintaining the cohesion of our alliances.

For the first two decades of the postwar period, our allies in the Atlantic Community, Japan and elsewhere could count on our unquestioned strategic superiority. The longstanding Soviet superiority in conventional forces on the Eurasian land mass was offset by superior American strategic power as the guarantee of our allies' security.

The massive growth of the Soviet strategic arsenal and our unilateral self-restraint in the sixties and seventies have altered this situation. We no longer possess the strategic advantage we once had, and indeed we face significant weaknesses in several areas of strategic weaponry.

This shift in the strategic balance makes it more important for us and our allies to address the problem of conventional and regional imbalances while doing whatever is necessary to restore strategic stability.

The Soviet Union has also expanded its conventional forces and its global reach at a rapid rate in tandem with its nuclear buildup. Our vulnerability in many regions of the world such as the Persian Gulf is apparent, as is the impressive growth of the Soviets' ability to project power worldwide.

This development is even more sobering given the increasing proclivity of the Soviets since the mid-1970's to use their forces and those of their proxies, in Angola, Ethiopia, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan, as well as to threaten their neighbors, as in Poland, or to try to subvert our neighbors, as in Central America.

My concern is that the growth of Soviet strategic power can therefore have an important effect on the Soviets' willingness to run risks in a regional conflict or crisis. Correspondingly, it makes our response more difficult.

In the Cuban missile crisis in 1962 and in the Middle East alert in 1973, American strategic power was an important element in denying the Soviet Union any credible option to escalate beyond the local level. In the Cuban case, we possessed an overwhelming strategic as well as local superiority. In the case of the 1973 alert, we still had some advantage.

I do not want to see the day come when, in a replay of the Cuban crisis or Middle East alert, the numbers and the results are reversed.

The Peacekeeper ICBM has a direct relevance to this problem of Soviet risk-taking. If the Soviets can strike effectively at our land-based ICBM's while our land-based deterrent does not have comparable capability, the Soviets might believe they have a significant advantage in a crucial dimension of the strategic balance. They could seek to gain political leverage by a threat of nuclear blackmail.

Without arguing the question of whether the Soviets are prepared to launch a nuclear first strike, such a crucial imbalance in strategic capabilities could well make them bolder in a regional conflict or in a major crisis.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I believe our foreign policy—and our ability to defend our interests and our most cherished values—would be critically strengthened if the Congress gives strong backing to the program the President outlined yesterday.

Modernization of our strategic deterrent and of our land-based ICBM force in particular is essential to the goal he stated, that of "preventing conflict, reducing the risks of war, and safeguarding the peace." That is why the Peacekeeper program is so important. It will demonstrate our commitment to maintaining the strategic balance and to maintaining the credibility of our land-based strategic forces.

It will enhance our capacity to deter nuclear war and significant conventional attack or the threat of either. It will strengthen our commitment to the security of the United States and its allies and friends. It will also increase Moscow's incentive to negotiate seriously in START and other arms-reduction talks.

ARMS REDUCTIONS AND THE STRATEGIC BALANCE

Let me say more on that subject. I know that the Congress and all Americans share our hopes that arms-control negotiations with the Soviet Union will bring about a significant reduction of nuclear arsenals and a significant evening of the dangers of nuclear war. Strategic arms control has been a subject of major controversy and concern for well over a decade.

If we have learned anything from those debates and negotiations, we should have learned this fundamental truth. The process of strategic arms control depends absolutely on the demonstrated ability of the United States to maintain the strategic balance. This, in turn, depends, as it always has, on maintaining a modern, capable triad of strategic forces.

The Peacekeeper ICBM is a critical component of that modernized triad. The Peacekeeper represents the response which every administration since that of President Nixon has believed necessary to offset at least partially the formidable Soviet ICBM arsenal. In this profoundly simple sense, a new missile like the Peacekeeper is not only consistent with strategic arms control but it is an essential element of the process.

From the standpoint of the SALT II Treaty, that treaty was premised on the existence of the Peacekeeper, or MX, as it was then called. From the standpoint of the negotiations in which we are engaged today—not only to limit strategic arms but to reduce them—it is even more important to maintain the balance.

I know from personal experience that the Soviets are tough bargainers, as we are and must be as well. They make no compromises for free, nor should we. Only if they see the United States determined to modernize our strategic forces will they have an incentive to negotiate a verifiable agreement establishing equal or lower levels. Only if they see no possibility of achieving superiority will they accede to real arms reductions based on equality.

The Peacekeeper is fully consistent with all the specific provisions of existing SALT agreements. Deploying 100 of the new missiles in existing Minuteman silos, as the President proposes, will involve no construction of new fixed launchers, no increase in silo volume, and no increase in MIRVed ICBM launchers. Moreover, the limited number is obviously far too few to be destabilizing.

NEW SMALL ICBM

Questions have been asked, I know, about the new small ICBM proposed by the Scowcroft Commission and the President. Some have wondered how this is consistent with either SALT II or a possible START agreement. The SALT II Treaty would have permitted deployment of no more than one ICBM on each side. On our side the new missile would be the Peacekeeper, but that treaty, even if it had been ratified, would have expired at the end of 1985.

The President's proposal calls for the start of engineering development of a possible new small ICBM. No deployment could be possible until after 1990, long after the SALT II time period had expired and long before that time we would hope that a START agreement will have established a new regime for maintaining a stable strategic balance.

Beyond this, the new small missile, if it proves feasible, would have broader positive implications for arms control. It would enhance stability, which has always been a central objective of arms control since the process began. Secretary Weinberger has explained it may move the evolution of strategic systems in a stabilizing direction over the long term.

Our START proposals can be flexible enough to accommodate this small missile. There is no guarantee that a restructuring of United States and Soviet forces will take place in the near future, but time may well give both sides incentive to move in this direction. The United States-Soviet strategic competition will continue into the long-term future, but we can make an historical decision now that can shape the strategic relationship in a positive way for decades to come.

To sum up, Mr. Chairman, as Secretary of State I can only share with the Secretary of Defense the conviction that modernization of our strategic forces is a matter of the highest priority. A credible, flexible strategic force is not only vital to the balance of power but is the essential foundation of our role as leader and defender of free nations.

The fundamental goal of nuclear deterrence depends upon it. Our goal of deterring nonnuclear war or nuclear blackmail also depends upon it. The Peacekeeper missile is indispensible to our near-term goals of restoring the strategic balance, deterring challenges, and providing an incentive to the Soviets for serious negotiations on arms reductions.

Research and possible development of a small ICBM may enhance strategic stability into the next century. As the Snowcroft Commission stressed, neither of the two systems can insure security alone. They are complementary. Strength and peace are also complementary. Both must be pursued with determination and with that determination both can be achieved.

Address by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger) at Fordham University, New York, April 28, 1983 [39]

Moral Aspects of Deterrence

We learn from the Book of Deuteronomy that Moses, at the twilight of his life, summoned the children of Israel together. He reminded them of God's commandments to his people. And he ended with these words:

> ". . . I set before you life or death, blessing or curse. Choose life, then, so that you and your descendants may live."

Moses spoke to the Israelites as individuals, calling each person to follow God's laws in his or her own life. But he also spoke to the Israelites as a nation, reminding them that together they shared a common heritage and responsibility, and could share a common fate.

So too religious leaders today call us, not just as men and women responsible for our individual souls, but as a nation responsible for our common fate, to choose life. Let me then firmly state my disagreement with those who say that the Catholic Bishops and other religious authorities should not be addressing the weighty questions posed by modern arms. You will not hear me talk today about rendering unto Caesar—for life is a gift not of Caesar but of God.

The charge to choose life is also a political responsibility, echoed in our Declaration of Independence and in our Constitution. And in the age of nuclear weapons this charge has taken on new meaning for all people, and for religious and political leaders alike, because now a nation truly can choose between life and death, and between freedom or slavery, and between peace with freedom, or a peace such as Poland endures, without freedom, and it chooses not just for itself but for its descendants.

Today our Constitutional responsibility "to provide for the common defense" is an awesome one. It poses terrible questions and imposes terrible burdens and calculations on us all—with no margin for error. And in confronting those questions and calculations every day in my position as Secretary of Defense, I am fully aware of their moral implications. I agree with the introduction to the third draft of the pastoral letter on war and peace, that "there is no satisfactory answer to the human problems of the nuclear age which fails to consider the moral and religious dimensions of the questions that we face." [40]

Therefore, in speaking today about these moral and religious dimensions to nuclear deterrence, I intend to speak from two perspectives: that of an individual Christian, and that of the Secretary of Defense.

Do not mistake me. I do not believe those two roles are incompatible. But they present several inherent challenges, and it is these challenges that I wish to share with you. For, as I have been forced to confront them, so also will each one of you as future leaders of our nation.

Consider, for example, the Biblical injunction to love your enemy. The individual Christian is called to turn the other cheek, to give those who would take his coat not just the coat, but his cloak as well. Yet a Christian acting on behalf of his nation, or, in the case of the United States, on behalf of an alliance of free nations, cannot simply turn the cheek of innocent people toward their aggressors, or hand over the fruits of other peoples' labor. Pope John XXIII recognized the protective duty of the Christian statesman in his encyclical Pacem in Terris:

> "The safety of the commonwealth is not only the first law, but it is a government's whole reason for existence."

The Catholic Church has, as the pastoral letter points out, "always been prepared to relate moral principles to concrete problems." We are greatly indebted, for example, to individuals like Terence Cardinal Cooke, the military vicar, and the military chaplains for their support and counsel to our servicemen and women. Here at this renowned Catholic institution, then, it is fitting that we consider the guidance the Church has given political leaders for two millenia.

Since the days when Christians served in the Roman Army the Church has been helping its people decide when to fight and when to lay down arms, when the state is acting justly and when it is imposing injustice.

Today, the leaders of the Church continue that important role. His Holiness, Pope John Paul II, in his message for the 15th World Day of Peace, summed up the church's teaching in this way:

> " . . . Christians, even as they strive to resist and prevent every form of warfare . . . have a right and even a duty to protect their existence and freedom by proportionate means against an unjust aggressor."

Yet he also gave a special caution for this, the nuclear age, reminding us that:

> "War is the most barbarous and least effective way of resolving conflicts."

Americans are well aware of this truth. We are not a warlike people. Twice in the first half of this century we resisted involvement in foreign wars. Twice we finally had to face our moral obligation to resist aggression and come to the aid of our friends and allies.

By the end of World War II, we found ourselves, almost inadvertently, the richest and most powerful nation in the world—and in sole possession of the most terrible weapons mankind has ever known. With our monopoly on nuclear weapons, the United States sought not to control the world but, through the Baruch Plan,[41] to put those weapons under international control. With our material wealth the United States sought not to establish an empire, but to rebuild democracy and rekindle economic growth for friend and foe alike. We tried, I believe harder than any nation has tried before, to love those who had been enemies, to "seek peace and pursue it." (Psalm 34:14)

In seeking peace, we pursued a strategy of deterrence that has been the basis of our defense policy ever since George Washington, in the very first State of the Union address, told Congress that "to be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace." But nuclear deterrence presented a greater paradox than this: To ensure that these terrible weapons were never used, we had to demonstrate that we were willing and able to use them to respond to attack. It is this uncomfortable paradox we have had to live with in the atomic age; but it is also this paradox of deterrence that for almost 40 years has kept the peace and preserved our freedom.

Not only has deterrence worked; it is consistent with many principles of Catholic teaching on war and the use of nuclear weapons, as discussed in the third draft of the Pastoral letter on war and peace. Our national policy and Catholic teaching are both based on a "presumption against war and for peaceful settlement of disputes." Together we reject "offensive war of any kind;" together we acknowledge that "every nation has a right and duty to defend itself against unjust aggression." The church denounces a policy of using nuclear weapons "for the purpose of destroying population centers or other predominantly civilian targets." So does the United States. The church supports "immediate, bilateral, verifiable agreements to curb the testing, production, and deployment of new nuclear weapons systems." The United States is actively pursuing such agreements in Geneva, where we are seeking to achieve major reductions in the arsenals of war. Above all, church and nation agree that there would be no "winners" in a nuclear war—that all mankind would lose.

[41] Reference is to the U.S. plan for the international control of atomic energy presented by Bernard M. Baruch, the U.S. Representative, on June 14, 1946.

The pastoral letter also reflects a concern which President Reagan raised in his recent speech to the American people. "Would it not," he asked, "be better to save lives than to avenge them?" His answer was to propose that we seek to develop a new defense against nuclear missiles. Pope John Paul II has called upon us to seek "a better way." In a world where we cannot simply banish the knowledge of nuclear weapons, defense against missiles may be such a way.

But I do not want to pretend that there are no disagreements about nuclear strategy, or that we have resolved all the challenges of deterrence. Let me turn, then, to three of those challenges that we must keep before us as we debate the morality of war and peace in the nuclear age.

The first is the horror of all wars. We must seek to prevent not just another Hiroshima, but also another Dresden, or Bataan. When 50 million people died in World War II, it was a lesson for all time that a holocaust need not be nuclear.

The nuclear deterrence we extend to our allies, then, must protect them not just against nuclear threats, but, working with the allies, protect us all against the awesome conventional power of the Soviet Union—a power the Soviets have shown in Hungary, in Czechoslovakia, and in Afghanistan that they are willing to use, a power demonstrated in the use of chemical and toxin weapons, in violation of their treaty obligations, against soldiers and civilians alike. The draft pastoral letter's acknowledgement that a change in the strategy of extended deterrence would require "an alternative defense posture," is absolutely correct. Let us recognize as well that such an emphasis on conventional weapons would require far larger defense budgets, and far more men in arms.

Another part of the debate about nuclear war emphasizes another challenge of the nuclear age. The United States rejects a strategy which targets nuclear weapons against population centers. But to maintain a credible deterrent we must be able to retaliate against military targets that the Soviets have protected, or "hardened" against attack. For this we need very modern and accurate weapons. Likewise, we need better command, control, communications, and intelligence capabilities—a priority which the pastoral letter also supports.

Yet, some say that more accurate weapons make nuclear war easier to imagine and easier to begin. To this I must respond by asking: Would it be more ethical to use that argument to justify maintaining only less accurate weapons that could only attack population centers? I believe the answer is no—but let us recognize that this is an inherent problem of the nuclear age.

We in the United States are under no illusions about the dangers of nuclear war. We believe that neither side could win such a war. But this recognition on our part is not enough by itself to prevent the outbreak of nuclear war: the Soviet leadership must recognize it too, and the best way to secure that recognition, is for us to maintain the retaliatory capability that is the essence of deterrence.

This raises the third challenge: The behavior of the Soviet Union—a regime which explicitly rejects the laws and the love of God. During the 1970's the United States made a conscious choice to restrict its nuclear weapons developments so that the Soviet Union would not feel we had a first strike threat, and therefore first strike intentions. But the Soviets did not follow our self-imposed restraint. Instead they developed several new ICBMs specifically designed to destroy U.S. missile silos and B-52 bases. And they continue to deploy a vast array of additional weapons to threaten us and our allies.

Today we see that the number, the explosive power, and the accuracy of Soviet nuclear weapons are far greater than would be needed simply to deter attack; in fact, they represent a potential first-strike capability. In addition, the Soviets have developed a refiring capability for some of their larger ICBMs, which could allow them to reload their delivery systems several times. They have given us indications that they think they could limit the damage to themselves from a nuclear war by hardening their silos and protecting key targets with elaborate air defenses and by investing large amounts in civil defense. Their writings, military doctrine, and exercises emphasize the kind of nuclear war fighting scenario which we in the United States have rejected—and which we must deter.

We will never deter war if we do not look those truths in the face. Winston Churchill once said of Neville Chamberlain that he "lacked imagination in evil."

But, as Pope John Paul II reminded us in his message for the Day of Peace, "Christians are aware that plans based on aggression, domination and the manipulation of others lurk in human hearts."

We also need imagination in peace—that beautiful word which is so freely used and so readily abused. There is great danger that we will ask too little of peace, that we will seek no positive vision for our world.

The pastoral letter shared this concern, quoting from the Pastoral Constitution of Vatican II that:

> "Peace is not merely the absence of war. Nor can it be reduced solely to the maintenance of a balance of power between enemies. Nor is it brought about by dictatorship. Instead, it is rightly and appropriately called 'an enterprise of justice.'" (Isaiah 32:7)

When Christ said, "It is not peace I come to bring, but a sword," I do not believe he meant that his followers should take up arms to spread his gospel. Indeed, he rebuked them when they interpreted his words that way. But I do believe that religion and morality call us to judge between good and evil, and to recognize that injustice is an offense against peace even where there is no war.

Let us not lose confidence that America has a special mission for peace. Our Constitution calls us "to secure the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity." Our leadership in the Free World calls us to help our friends and allies deter aggression and preserve and foster democratic freedom. Our strategy of deterrence, then, is a strategy for a richer peace: A peace with liberty, with justice, and with the freedom to follow the dictates of God, and our conscience. To choose less is not to choose life, in the true and full sense of that great blessing.

Prepared Statement by the Deputy Secretary of State (Dam) Before the Senate Appropriations Committee, May 4, 1983 [42]

Strategic Modernization

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee.

I appreciate the opportunity to appear before this distinguished committee in support of the President's recommendations to the Congress on strategic modernization.

Tomorrow, Secretary of Defense Weinberger and General Vessey will address the military aspects of our strategic force posture. Today, I shall discuss the foreign policy and arms control implications of the President's strategic modernization program.

Maintaining an effective and stable nuclear deterrent presents the President and the Congress with difficult and complex choices. As the Chairman of the President's bipartisan Commission on Strategic Forces, General Scowcroft, has said: "There are no simple solutions to the questions that must be answered in basing our forces, achieving equitable arms control agreements and improving strategic stability."

As this committee knows, the specific issue of a new American ICBM has been debated hotly for almost a decade. It is time that we made a decision. And, in my view, that decision should be to proceed with production and deployment of the Peacekeeper missile.

There has been consensus on the need for a new ICBM for many years now. Each of the past four Presidents has supported the development of a new ICBM, and the Congress has been supportive as well. It is the choice of a basing mode for that new ICBM that has complicated the production and deployment decision.

The President's bipartisan Commission on Strategic Forces has completed its review of the overall U.S. strategic posture. The Commission studied a number of alternative basing modes for a new ICBM, consulted with Congress, and presented unanimous conclusions concerning U.S. strategic forces and arms control. The Commission conclusions have now been accepted by the President, and the President's recommendations are before the Congress. These recommendations provide the basis for developing a broad national consensus.

Let me now address the foreign policy implications of those recommendations.

Foreign Policy and the Strategic Balance

The most important goals of our defense and foreign policy are to prevent war and to maintain a just peace.

The foundation of peace in the nuclear age has been America's strategy of deterrence. Since we first acquired nuclear weapons, the United States has sought to prevent war by discouraging aggression against the United States and its allies. By presenting any potential aggressor with the prospect of certain retaliation, peace has been maintained for nearly 40 years. The history of the 20th century makes it sadly clear that peaceful intentions and good motives alone will not stop aggressors. Adequate military strength does do so, and the strategy of deterrence has been successful in protecting the security of America and Western Europe since the end of World War II.

The strategic balance, however, has dimensions beyond deterrence. That balance shapes the global context in which American foreign policy operates. As Deputy Secretary of State I am acutely aware that America's military strength is vital to the conduct of foreign policy. Our perceived strengths and weaknesses directly affect our ability to achieve our goals. Therefore, the decisions we make or fail to make on weapons programs are bound to influence the judgments not only of our adversaries but also of our allies and friends around the world.

The growth of Soviet military power relative to the United States over the past 10 years has had a direct effect on Soviet willingness to challenge America's interests around the world. Moscow is using its power directly in Syria, Poland, and Afghanistan, and indirectly through its proxies in Angola and closer to home in Central America. These are the tangible manifestations of growing Soviet power.

Our concern is that unless we maintain a strategic nuclear balance between the United States and the Soviet Union, the problem of Soviet adventurism will persist and may get even worse.

If for example, the Soviets are able to strike effectively at our land-based ICBMs while we do not have comparable capability, Moscow might believe it could gain political leverage by a threat of nuclear blackmail. Without arguing the question of whether the Soviets are prepared to launch a nuclear first strike, one can recognize that such a crucial imbalance in strategic capabilities could well make them bolder in a regional conflict or in a major crisis. That situation can not be in the interest of either this nation or of world peace.

Our visible commitment to maintaining the strategic balance is also essential to sustain the confidence of our friends and cohesion of our alliances. While we have debated among ourselves, and tabled serious arms control initiatives at the negotiating table, the Soviets have deployed—repeatedly. Over the past decade the Soviets have deployed three new ICBMs. They have tested two more in the last six months and have at least two additional new types of ICBMs in development.

What would our allies and other nations conclude about American strength, resolve and reliability if we were to fail to deploy a new ICBM in the face of these Soviet developments?

Our foreign policy, and our ability to defend our interests and our most cherished values, will be decisively strengthened if the Congress gives strong backing to the program the President announced last month.

Modernization of our deterrent, and of our land-based ICBM force in particular, is essential to the goals of preventing conflict, reducing the risks of war, and demonstrating our resolve to adversaries and allies alike.

At the same time, it will also increase Moscow's incentive to negotiate seriously in START (Strategic Arms Reduction Talks) and other arms reductions talks. Let me say more on that subject.

Arms Reduction and the Strategic Balance

It is important to note that the Scowcroft Commission did not consider the ICBM problem, or even our overall strategic posture, in isolation from other issues. They also considered the relationship between strategic programs and arms control.

The Commission made clear that there was a necessary complementarity between strategic programs and arms control. Both arms control and modernization programs can affect the strategic balance. Vigorous pursuit of both is the best course to pursue. To quote the Scowcroft Commission Report: "Our arms control proposals and our strategic arms programs should thus be integrated and be mutually reinforcing. They should work together to permit us, and encourage the Soviets, to move in directions that reduce or eliminate the advantage of aggression and also reduce the risk of war by accident or miscalculation."

President Reagan adopted this dual approach early in his Administration. When he announced his modernization program, he also announced that the United States would negotiate with the Soviet Union to achieve mutual and deep nuclear arms reductions. We are now negotiating seriously with the Soviets in Geneva on both intermediate range and strategic nuclear weapons.

If we have learned anything from our experience in arms control negotiations over the last two decades, we should have learned this fundamental truth: the process of arms control depends on the demonstrated ability of the United States to maintain an effective strategic force. This, in turn, depends, as it always has, on maintaining a modern, capable triad of strategic forces. The Peacekeeper ICBM is a critical component of that modernized triad.

As a lawyer, I know that negotiations begin only when both parties believe they have something to gain by talking or something to lose by failing to talk. Without the incentive of gain or loss provided by our modernization program, the Soviets would see no advantage in negotiating seriously to reduce their own nuclear force.

The Peacekeeper represents the response that each of the past four administrations has considered necessary to offset, at least partially, the formidable Soviet ICBM arsenal. The question now before us is whether we shall abandon this decade-long modernization program.

As the Scowcroft Commission Report reasoned: "It is illusory to believe that we could obtain a satisfactory agreement with the Soviets limiting ICBM deployments if we unilaterally terminated the only new U.S. ICBM program that could lead to deployment in this decade . . . . Abandoning the MX at this time in search of a substitute would jeopardize, not enhance, the likelihood of reaching a stabilizing and equitable agreement."

The Commission's recommendations included more than support for deploying the Peacekeeper missile. The Commission also recommended, and the President agreed, that the full modernization program begun in 1981 be continued.

It also recommended development of a new small single-warhead missile and continuation of research on survivability improvements for our ICBMs, including active defense and silo hardening.

Mr. Chairman, questions have been raised about whether the proposed modernization program is consistent with our arms control objectives and our obligations under past arms control agreements. Let me assure you that the proposed program is fully consistent with those objectives and obligations.

The Peacekeeper is consistent with all specific provisions of existing SALT agreements. Deploying 100 of the new missiles in existing Minuteman silos, as the President proposed, would involve no construction of new fixed launchers, no increase in silo volume, and no increase in MIRVed (multiple independently-targetable reentry vehicle) ICBM launchers. Moreover, the 100 new Peacekeeper missiles in Minutemen silos are obviously far too small a force to be destabilizing.

Some have wondered, however, how the development of a small ICBM in addition to the Peacekeeper would be consistent with either SALT II or a possible START agreement.

The SALT II Treaty would have permitted deployment of no more than one new ICBM on each side. On our side, the new missile would be the Peacekeeper. But that treaty, even if it had been ratified, would have expired at the end of 1985. The President's proposal calls for the start of engineering development of a new small ICBM, but no deployment would be possible until after 1990—long after the SALT II time period had expired. And long before that time, we would hope that a START agreement will have established a new regime for maintaining a stable strategic balance.

Beyond this, the new small missile, if it proves feasible, would have broader, positive implications for arms control. It would enhance stability, because it would be more survivable, and stability has always been a central objective of arms control since the process began. As Secretary Weinberger has explained, it may move the evolution of strategic systems in a stabilizing direction over the long term. The basic concepts underlying our START proposals are flexible enough to accommodate this small missile.

Mr. Chairman, the U.S.-Soviet strategic competition will continue into the long-term future, and there is no guarantee that a restructuring of U.S. and Soviet forces in the direction of single warheads will take place in the near future. But we believe both sides have real incentives to move in this direction. In the meantime, we need now to take the hard decisions necessary to ensure a safe strategic relationship for the years immediately ahead.

Conclusion

To sum up, I share with the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense the conviction that modernization of our strategic forces is a matter of the highest priority. A credible, flexible strategic force is not only vital to the balance of power but is the essential foundation of our role as leader and defender of free nations. The fundamental goal of nuclear deterrence depends on a credible force. Our goal of deterring non-nuclear war or nuclear blackmail also depends on it.

The Peacekeeper missile is indispensable to our near-term goals of restoring the strategic balance, achieving deterrence and providing an incentive to the Soviets for serious negotiations on arms reductions. Development of a small ICBM may well enhance strategic stability in the longer term. But as the Scowcroft Commission stressed, neither of the two systems can ensure security alone; they are complementary.

Strength and peace are also complementary. Both must be pursued with determination. And with that determination, both can be achieved.

Remarks by President Reagan, May 16, 1983 [43]

MX Missile Deployment

Thank you very much. Thank you. Please sit down. Thank you for coming today. I realize it's very rough to break away from the office on short notice. But, the reason I've asked you to come is an important one—kind of an arm-twisting session.

For more than a decade, modernization of America's land based, strategic missile force has been analyzed, debated, and pondered by the Congress, four administrations, countless congressional committees and subcommittees, and nearly every columnist who's ever put pen to paper.

During all this time not one new U.S. missile has been deployed. In fact, the opposite has occurred. We've begun retiring our Titan ICBM's because of their old age—don't think what I'm thinking. (Laughter) (Applause)

ICBM, of course, stands for Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles. (Laughter) and by comparison, last year alone the Soviet Union deployed more than 1,200 ICBM warheads which is more than is projected for our entire MX Peacekeeper program. So, we've had a price, or paid a price, for our past unilateral restraint and indecision. And the growing imbalance in strategic forces has weakened the credibility of our nuclear deterrent. Our self-restraint has left the Soviet Union with far less incentive to negotiate arms reductions.

The debate, analysis, and posturing are just about over. Within the next 2 weeks the Congress will decide the issue. They'll determine whether or not our deterrence, the key to peace in the nuclear age, will be strengthened. They'll also decide whether arms reduction negotiations now underway will have a chance to bring about a safer and more secure future.

When the Congress votes on the Peacekeeper program and later on the small missile funds, it will not be just another vote. Leaders in Western Europe, in the Kremlin, leaders everywhere will be watching because they know the decision will have a profound impact for generations to come.

It's hardly possible to exaggerate the stakes that are involved. The full Senate is scheduled to debate later this week on MX, and the House next week. The specific legislative proposal is to approve flight testing of the Peacekeeper missile and the work necessary for basing it in the existing Minuteman silos.

Implicit in the vote is the okay for the production of the missiles. And this is the essential first step for deployment of 100 Peacekeeper missiles, beginning in 1986, and for the development of a new, small single-warhead ICBM which would be mobile.

Congressional approval will be a clear signal of national resolve, the critical message so necessary if we're to assure deterrence and real arms reductions. When I endorsed the recommendations of the Scowcroft Commission, I did so in large measure because of its thoughtful integration of three indispensable elements—modernization, deterrence, and arms control.

There's a direct relationship between modernization programs like the Peacekeeper and the twin objectives of deterrence and arms control. Tear the elements apart and you have less security. Keep them together and the future of peace and freedom are strengthened.

Now, this isn't a partisan issue. The Scowcroft Commission demonstrated that it's possible to undertake a complex, emotional issue of extraordinary consequence and achieve bipartisan consensus.

Leading Republicans and Democrats across the country and senior officials from past administrations joined our call to build and deploy the Peacekeeper and to build the small, single-warhead missile, but not so we can fight a war. They want to build those missiles so America can secure deep arms reductions and preserve the peace. So do I, and so do we all.

Now, the question is whether the Congress can also reach a consensus, a consensus that will unite us in our common search for ways to strengthen our national security, reduce the risk of war and, ultimately, reduce the level of nuclear weapons. The security and well-being of our nation desperately require a lasting, national, bipartisan consensus.

We must sustain it from one administration to the next on arms control initiatives, defense policy and fundamental issues on foreign policy. A vote for the Peacekeeper program can lay the foundation for this consensus.

During the past several weeks, I've met with many members of the Congress. I've provided written replies to the specific concerns expressed by individual Senators and Congressmen. And, now, we're approaching the critical moment. In my discussions with the Congress, I've asked all Democrats and Republicans to act responsibly and to act together to endorse the Scowcroft Commission's recommendations.

Last week, two key congressional committees voted to support these recommendations. And now I'm asking you for your active support.

I want to again thank you for taking time from your busy schedules. Your presence proves you understand the stakes involved. But understanding isn't good enough. To ensure that the final decision is a reflection of a national consensus, you must express your views and make your voices heard. I hope that you'll do just that and do it soon.

The legislative clock is about to run out on this particular issue. So, again, I thank you for being here and again let me say because I'm so frustrated hearing the amateur psychoanalysis of some individuals that I don't really want arms reduction. Well, then why did I say it over and over again in the campaign? Why did I appoint two commissions that are in Geneva—one negotiating on the strategic missiles and the other on the intermediate-range missiles in Europe? I do want arms control. I can't believe that this world can go on beyond our generation and on down to succeeding generations with this kind of weapon on both sides poised at each other without someday some fool or some maniac or some accident triggering the kind of war that is the end of the line for all of us. And I just think of what a sigh of relief would go up from everyone on this Earth if someday—and this is what I have—my hope, way in the back of my head—is that if we start down the road to reduction, maybe one day in doing that, somebody will say, "Why not all the way? Let's get rid of all these things." And that's why any of those fellows up on the Hill, lean on them. Do anything you can to persuade them that we must have this.

I know it sounds silly that—to build a missile in order to get rid of missiles. But we're very dangerously close to not having the deterrent that we need to keep the other fellow from using his or at least using them for blackmail.

So, we have to modernize to the point that there is a deterrent, that he knows that the damage to himself would be too great to risk pushing the button. And then with that taken care of, we start down to an equal and verifiable limit on both sides.

And I'm going to quit talking because I know there are others that are going to be speaking to you and I've got to get back to the Oval Office. But thank you all, again, very much for being here. (Applause)

Prepared Statement by the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy (Iklé) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, May 18, 1983 [44]

Ballistic Missile Defense

Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to discuss the national security implications of outer space and the President's recent initiative on ballistic missile defense. [45]

The technological revolutions in the possible uses of outer space have opened new opportunities—as well as threats—for national defense. Both United States and Soviet Armed Forces use satellite systems. U.S. military space assets provide support for military operations, such as: communications, command and control, warning, navigation, and weather information. In fact, space systems are used increasingly for command, control and communications. Our launch detection satellites and strategic warning systems contribute to our nuclear deterrence. Space systems also enable us to monitor compliance with arms control agreements.

Needless to stress, the U.S. military use of space is consistent with international law.

Our military space programs are not simply a reaction to Soviet space activities but are the result of our continuing evaluation of the best means of achieving our national security objectives. We see space as a region in which supporting military operations may be carried out. While our programs are not a reaction to those of the U.S.S.R., we must, of course, take account of Soviet space activities. As in other areas, the Soviet approach to space differs considerably from our own.

SOVIET SPACE ACTIVITIES

With the development and employment of an orbital antisatellite weapon over a decade ago, the Soviet Union clearly signaled its recognition of space as an arena in which to conduct war.

In the past 10 years, the U.S.S.R. has been launching more than 75 spacecraft per year, a rate of four-to-five times that of the United States. Over the past few years, the rate has been close to 100 annually. The annual payload weight placed into orbit by the Soviets is even more impressive—660,000 pounds—ten times that of the United States. This level of effort reflects the importance the Soviets attach to their space programs. But it may also reflect some technological weakness in the longevity and flexibility of their spacecraft.

Soviet military and military-related space programs range from extended manned missions, to meteorological, communications, navigational, reconnaissance, surveillance, targeting and antisatellite missions.

Since the U.S.S.R.'s successful launch of Sputnik I in 1957, the Soviets have pursued a vigorous and methodical program to exploit space for military purposes. The initial Soviet use of space for military applications occurred in 1961 with the launch of their first photographic reconnaissance satellite. Throughout the 1960's and 1970's, Soviet military space programs expanded in both scope and numbers. By now, these programs had developed into mature, integrated systems for the direct and indirect support of Soviet military forces, and with the capability to threaten low-altitude U.S. and allied satellites.

On any given day, 70–110 Soviet satellites are in orbit, more than half of which serve primarily military purposes. Some 85 percent of all Soviet space launches are primarily military or joint military/civilian missions.

It appears that the Soviets are developing a re-usable space system, similar to the U.S. space shuttle, and a smaller space plane. Orbital developmental test flights of the smaller vehicle have already occurred. These systems could be in regular use within a decade and will further expand the military flexibility and capability of the Soviet space effort.

Soviet manned space missions are becoming increasingly complex and constitute the single most extensive element of the Soviet space program. After accomplishing many firsts in the early 1960's, including the first man in space, the Soviet manned program was momentarily overshadowed by the U.S. manned program during the late 1960's. Since 1971, the Soviets have placed seven space stations in orbit. The first Salyut I manned space station was launched in 1971. A second type of Salyut station was launched in 1973. Both were capable of conducting military research.

By 1977, the Soviets had developed the capability to resupply and exchange personnel on their Salyut space stations. On three occasions the Soviets have conducted manned missions lasting as long as 6 months. With completion in 1982 of the 211 day mission, the Soviets set a new record.

The Soviet commitment to their manned space program is growing. The development of a large manned space station by about 1990 to maintain a military presence in space is, we believe, one of the goals of the new heavy-lift launcher systems now in development. The Soviets also will use the heavy-lift space boosters to orbit even larger space stations and space modules before the end of the century. Such space stations could weigh more than 100 tons and be able to support a large crew for extended periods without replenishment.

The U.S.S.R.'s introduction, application and known future development of space weapon systems point to a coordinated program involving:

The present generation of antisatellite vehicles, now operational and designed to destroy low-orbiting satellites.

A very large, directed energy research program including the development of laser-beam weapons systems which could be based either on the ground, or aboard the next generation of Soviet antisatellite systems or Soviet manned space stations.

The operational Soviet antisatellite system has the capability to destroy U.S. space systems in near-Earth orbit. The Soviets conduct yearly tests to practice satellite interception and to refine the ASAT system. We believe that one of the purposes of the Soviet Union's space weapons program is the development and deployment of a space-based laser. The Soviets could launch the first prototype of a small space-based laser antisatellite weapon in the late 1980's or early 1990's. A system capable of attacking other satellites within a few thousand kilometers range might be possible in the 1990's. Space-based ABM systems could be tested in the 1990's, but probably would not be operational until after the turn of the century.

The Soviets have steadily increased their space photographic and electronic reconnaissance effort since the early 1960's. Each year over 50 of these satellites are launched to support military forces on a daily basis. The Soviet military space program also reflects an ever-increasing use of space for world-wide surveillance and warning. The Soviets have brought a number of United States and allied military forces under surveillance by these space-based systems. The surveillance satellites include an ICBM launch detection system and ocean surveillance systems, such as the two nuclear-powered satellites that caused worldwide alerts during their breakup and reentry into the Earth's atmosphere in 1978 and early 1983. Soviet efforts in the surveillance field are expected to lead to a multi-satellite detection, surveillance and attack-warning system against strategic and nonstrategic ballistic missiles and possibly bombers as well.

The Soviets also are increasing their use of space systems for command, control, and communications. Since the mid-1960's when their first communications satellite was launched, the U.S.S.R. has continued to improve and expand its communications satellite programs to support its political leadership and its military, diplomatic and intelligence missions.

The Soviets have embarked on an ambitious expansion of their communication satellite program that will significantly enhance their global command, control and communications capability. Over the next 10 years, the Soviets will develop and deploy an even more advanced series of communication satellites, some of which might relay transmissions from manned orbital command and control platforms.

DOD SPACE ACTIVITIES

Let me now turn to our own activities. In support of our national security, the Department of Defense acquires and operates space systems and pursues space-related research and technology development projects.

As noted, Soviet development of an operational antisatellite capability presents the potential for space to become a hostile environment. Therefore, the DOD space policy directs that military space systems, including essential ground elements as well as orbiting spacecraft, be designed, developed and operated to enhance their survivability and endurance.

Since 1977, it has been U.S. policy to pursue the continued development of an operational, non-nuclear antisatellite capability. If we have a credible retaliatory capability, we are better able to deter attacks against our space systems.

We are currently signatories of at least three treaties—which affect certain military activities in space: the Outer Space Treaty,[46] the Limited Test Ban Treaty,[47] and the Antiballistic Missile Treaty,[48] our treaty obligations include:

Liability for damages from activities in space (Outer Space Treaty);

The maintenance of space access to and operations in space (Outer Space Treaty);

And noninterference with national technical means of verification (ABM Treaty, Salt I,[49] Salt II).[50]

The Outer Space Treaty also prohibits, on the ,oon and other celestial bodies, the establishment of military bases, installations, and fortifications, the testing of any types of weapons, and the conduct of military maneuvers. This treaty also prohibits the placement in orbit around the Earth, installation on the Moon or other celestial bodies, or stationing in outer space of any objects carrying nuclear weapons or any other "weapons of mass destruction." The testing or orbiting (in outer space proper) of weapons using conventional explosives is not prohibited.

The 1972 ABM Treaty prohibits the development, testing, and deployment of space-based ABM systems and components (article V). Should future technology bring forth new ABM systems "based on other physical principles" such as lasers and particle beams, as opposed to those employed in current systems, it was agreed that limiting such systems would be discussed before deployment in accordance with the treaty's provisions for amendment.

In conclusion, let me say a few words about the President's initiative on strategic defense. The President decided that we embark on a program to counter the Soviet missile threat with measures that are defensive. He directed a comprehensive and intensive effort to define a long-term research and development program toward the goal of eliminating the threat posed by nuclear missiles. This development could be—indeed should be—complemented by arms control measures.

In accordance with the President's decision, the Defense Department, in cooperation with other agencies, has initiated a two-pronged effort: one to explore and prioritize the technologies, and the other to develop and define the policy and strategy options. We are not envisioning a single system to intercept and defend against all missile attacks. Our research is designed to explore a defense network—a series of systems not necessarily based on the same technology or physical principles—which taken together will provide an effective defense against nuclear ballistic missiles for us and our allies. We recognize full well that this is a long-term effort whose fruits may not be available until the next century.

Because this is a long-term effort we need to be clear, as the President explained, that we must continue for the interim to rely on deterrence to preserve the peace. We also must—and will—continue to pursue agreed reductions in nuclear arms that are balanced, and verifiable. Because our search for defensive technologies has the goal to reduce the threat of ballistic missiles, it is fully consistent with the arms reduction effort we are pursuing today in the START negotiations. It supports those efforts by offering the prospect that the effectiveness and role of ballistic missiles may be reduced sharply in the future. The President's initiative is, of course, also fully consistent with existing arms control agreements. While the ABM Treaty does prohibit the development, testing or deployment of ABM systems, it does permit research.

Mr. Chairman, the essence of the President's decision on strategic defense, in my view, is that it opens up alternative avenues to preserve the peace in the nuclear age. President Reagan's successors—in the next decade, or in the first decade of the next century—need not have their options limited by the strategic notions that were fashionable in the 1970's. Our strategic planning has been restricted far too much by the idea that defensive systems are bad and that we can and must, indefinitely, remain locked into a confrontation of all-powerful, offensive missile forces. We owe it to the next generation to make a determined search for better alternatives.

Address by Vice President Bush Before the Veterans of the Office of Strategic Services, May 24, 1983 [51]

Importance of Intelligence to National Security

Thank you, Bill.[52] Good evening. I'm honored to be here tonight participating in this ceremony, because I can't think of anyone who deserves the Donovan award more than Dick Helms. Having inherited his job at CIA—if only for a short time[53]—I gained a real respect and admiration for the magnitude of Dick's accomplishment over there.

Not many of you may know that before Dick got into intelligence, he was working for the other side—the press. In the thirties, Dick was a correspondent for UP in London and later, Berlin, where he observed first hand the developments in the

The occasion for the remarks of the Vice President was the presentation of the William J. Donovan award to Richard Helms. Donovan was Director of the Office of Strategic Services, 1942–1945; Helms was Director of Central Intelligence, 1966–1973.

Nazi government. He was even able to get a personal interview with Adolph Hitler. I hear tell that this meeting was mentioned in the so-called Hitler diaries, although the scholars apparently became suspicious when the diaries referred to Dick as the future director of the CIA.

Anyway, Dick joined up early with Wild Bill Donovan's OSS, organizing intelligence networks from his vantage point in England and other stations throughout Europe.

Still serving in the OSS after the war he closely observed Soviet methods and intransigence in Germany and Berlin. What he learned then made Dick Helms decide to stay on in Government service. He became convinced that the United States would face many threats in the postwar world, and he realized that effective intelligence was vital if the democratic societies were to be able to defend themselves against those threats.

It's hard to imagine now, but in 1940 and 41, Bill Donovan was a one-man CIA for Franklin Roosevelt. The OSS was brought into being in great part simply through the force of Donovan's determined personality.

Well, after World War II, it took other forceful personalities to define the role of our intelligence service in a very different, but equally threatening world situation. One might even say that with the introduction of nuclear weapons into the equation, the situation became even more threatening than it had been in the past. Dick Helms was instrumental in helping define that role. He has dedicated a good part of his life to the development of an agency that is second to none in intelligence gathering and analysis. But just as important, one that could exist within a free and democratic society.

It has been said that the role of secret intelligence in a democratic society will always be an uncomfortable one. Secrecy is not what democratic societies are all about. They're about free and open discussion, the free and open exchange of ideas and information.

Unfortunately, there are certain unpleasant realities that we can't ignore. We must live in a world made insecure by international terrorism and expansionist totalitarian powers.

But the CIA can be very proud of the fact that at the same time that it is working tirelessly to protect American freedoms from foreign threats, it is fastidious in respecting the laws of the land. The CIA is conscientiously upholding the law, safeguarding the rights of American citizens.

I was asked at a press conference the other day how, as a politician, I would justify to the American people being head of the CIA. I said that I wear my directorship of that organization as a badge of honor. I've always considered my service there as an asset rather than a liability, and I'll feel that way till the day I die. I don't think I'd be standing here in this job right now if the American people felt any differently. I think they want a strong intelligence service. I think anybody realizes that in a world as troubled as this you need the best possible intelligence.

I'm proud of the time I was in the CIA, because I'm proud of the men and women who serve there. I can't praise highly enough the academic excellence of our intelligence community, and the commitment of these people who have put in a lifetime of service to their country—many of them anonymously. They never get to sit at the head table; they never see their names up in lights. But all of us are profoundly grateful that these extraordinarily talented and dedicated people have sacrificed their place in the sun so that the rest of us may live secure in our freedom.

I've been doing a lot of traveling recently, and my sense of things is that the post-Vietnam, post-Watergate inclination to tear down our intelligence agencies is behind us now. I think we all realize that we must build on what we have, and that we must give our intelligence community the support it needs to enable it to get its job done.

You know, just one indication of how essential our intelligence has become in this world is that we couldn't even begin to think about arms control if we didn't have a CIA and an intelligence community to check up on the other side to make sure they're playing by the rules. A negotiated settlement on strategic weapons must ultimately rely on intelligence for its verifiability.

There are some things I think and some things I know, but one thing I know is that the President is deeply, fervently committed to arms control. I sit with him and he tells me of his hopes and fears for our future generation. But weakness in the face of a totalitarian adversary never made the world a safer place. Bill Donovan knew that, just as Winston Churchill and Franklin Roosevelt knew it. That is why the President has put so much emphasis on getting the MX program passed through Congress. This Administration has made it a top priority to redress the imbalance that has existed in both conventional and nuclear forces, because only by having the strength to endure war can we gain a lasting peace.

We will take every opportunity to negotiate a verifiable reduction in arms. But we will never again, as we did over the last decade, permit our armed forces to be downgraded in the vain hope that the Soviets will follow our example.

Any treaty has to insure equal and fair reductions on both sides. It is an interesting fact of public perception that this Administration's commitment to arms control is called into question, because it is under President Reagan that for the first time we are actually negotiating with the Soviets on arms reductions. Every treaty in the past has only put limits on arms build-ups.

Well, I look at the CIA as a kind of preventative medicine. The objective is to keep the peace by keeping ourselves informed and our national security apparatus strong and healthy; that way it won't become necessary to flight a war, as it did almost a half-century ago, because we have grown weak or because an enemy misjudges the firmness of our resolve.

Maybe there will come a time in the future when the world will be a happier place, free from the threat of nuclear war and no longer torn by international hostilities. When that time comes, it will be in no small measure due to the dedication and selfless service of men like Dick Helms who have devoted their lives and invested their great skills and imaginations in creating an intelligence agency of unparalleled professionalism and expertise—and in the process making this a safer and more peaceful world for all of us.

Statement by President Reagan, June 10, 1983 [54]

Extension of the President's Commission on Strategic Forces

First, I want to take this occasion to again thank members of both parties in the Congress for their support of the Scowcroft Commission's recommendations on modernization, deterrence, and arms control. [55] Their support for these crucial, interdependent recommendations gives us a genuine chance to achieve balanced, verifiable arms reductions—the goal we all seek. I am determined to achieve effective deterrence and significant strategic arms reductions, and I am confident that they can be achieved. But, if we are to secure our common objectives, the consensus we now have must be maintained.

I look forward to working with the Congress in the days ahead to maintain and strengthen this bipartisan consensus. In this regard, I will submit an annual status report to the Congress. To assist me in this effort, I am pleased to announce that I have asked the members of the Scowcroft Commission to continue to serve until January 3, 1984. The Commission will review, on a periodic basis, the progress made in implementing the recommendations contained in its report of April 1983, with particular reference to the deployment of the Peacekeeper missile, development and deployment of a small, single warhead intercontinental ballistic missile system, and developments in strategic arms reductions. The Commission will consider carefully the views of the Congress during the review. The value to the country of this bipartisan framework both with the Congress and through the Scowcroft Commission is evident to all. It must be and shall be sustained through and beyond the work of the Commission. I pledge this to the Congress and ask their reciprocal good faith.

In addition to consulting closely with the members of Congress, I have directed Chairman Scowcroft to seek out views and assistance from a wide variety of leading authorities in the strategic and arms control field. As before, the Chairman has authority to appoint Senior Counselors as he deems appropriate.

As we continue to move forward in this vital bipartisan effort, let us all keep in mind our fundamental goal—to conclude agreements that will enhance security and stability by reducing overall strategic force levels while permitting modernization of forces necessary for effective deterrence.

Address by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger) Before the National Conference of Editorial Writers, San Francisco, June 24, 1983 [56]

Revitalizing the National Defense

The defense issue is much in the news these days. In addition to the debate over nuclear weapons, we hear broader questions about the overall defense program and the defense budget. Public opinion polls indicate that most people now accept the need to counter the increased military threat from the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, questions remain about whether the administration's rearmament plans are affordable or even necessary. To some, the large defense increases we have requested seem merely an attempt to throw money at the problem—without a program of well thought-out priorities. Underlying all these concerns, I believe, is the fear that our rearmament program is ultimately unachievable—that year after year we will be asked to provide even higher resources for defense, with no end to the increases in sight.

Let me take this occasion to put the record straight. First, we do have a multiyear defense program with a realistic set of priorities to restore our military strength and regain a military balance with the Soviet Union. Second, our program is achievable—indeed, a good part of it has already been achieved in the last 2 1/2 years. Third, there is light at the end of the tunnel—if we continue with our plans and refuse to give in to calls to halt or cut back on a program which is only midway through.

When I left San Francisco in 1981, I expected to find some problems in Washington. But frankly, I was surprised to find conditions as bad as they were. First, my initial intelligence briefings showed that the Soviet threat had grown enormously in the 5 years since I had been in the government before. Their 20-year defense buildup had paid off. The Soviets now possessed a conventional military force capable of projecting power far beyond its borders, and attacking swiftly with larger, modernized, and increasingly flexible forces in more than one place at a time. The rapid Soviet buildup of nuclear forces was even more alarming, and the strategic balance had begun to tip dangerously in their favor.

Second, I discovered our own forces were in a sad state of disrepair as a result of declining defense budgets during the 1970's and years of underfunding existing accounts. When President Reagan took office he charged the Defense Department with taking a cold hard look at our existing force posture and developing a program to correct the shortcomings. The problems we found were in three areas.

—Equipment and facilities had been allowed to become obsolescent, yet planned modernization programs were inadequate to correct the years of neglect.

—Maintenance problems soared, yet much too little had been budgeted to keep equipment in good repair.

—Military morale was at an all time low because of inadequate compensation and the apparent neglect of the armed forces.

We knew the situation we found in 1981 could not be rectified overnight. And we knew that it would cost a very great deal to make up for the fact that our defense budgets had declined by more than 20 percent in real terms from 1970–1980—which was the second decade of Soviet expansion.

But we took the essential steps right away. We set priorities, made the tough decisions to cut out the nonessential, applied some good honest business sense to managing the rest, and made investments that are already showing dividends.

What we realized was that, in effect, we would have to accept "double duty." First, we had to act quickly to improve the basic readiness and staying power of the forces we had, so that if an immediate crisis were to arise, we would be ready to meet it. Being ready to meet such a crisis is the best way to avoid or deter it. But at the same time we had to make up for lost years of investment by emphasizing research and development and by modernizing and strengthening all our forces, particularly the three legs of our strategic triad of deterrence.

One of our highest priorities was to improve the readiness of our existing forces to restore adequate manpower and training, maintenance, and supplies of spare parts and ammunition. We requested, and received, the monies to do this.

We are already seeing results. The number of fully or substantially ready major active units has increased by over one third since 1980. Over the last 2 1/2 years we have also systematically reduced maintenance backlogs. We have cut in half the number of Navy ships awaiting overhaul and last fiscal year we eliminated the Army depot maintenance backlog. Training is up. For example, Air Force pilots now train an average of 20 flying hours per month compared to a dangerously low 13 hours a month in the late 1970's—an increase of 65 percent.

But our most dramatic success in the readiness area has been with military personnel. In 1981 we were faced with declining recruitment rates and an alarming exodus of our most competent and experienced personnel. The cumulative effect of years of inadequate pay and compensation had taken its toll—our armed forces could no longer attract or retain the highly qualified men and women they needed.

Upon taking office, we moved quickly to raise salaries, pay re-enlistment bonuses and improve the quality of life of the men and women in the armed forces. There is overwhelming evidence that our efforts paid off. The members of the armed forces—and the youth of America—quickly recognized that dignity had been restored to military service and that we were sincere about compensating them adequately for their work and sacrifices, and about providing the training they require to do their jobs properly. Then our junior officers and enlisted personnel began remaining beyond their initial terms. Then the morale, discipline, and harmony in our units and on our ships surged dramatically.

In the first 6 months of 1983, all four services have exceeded their recruitment objectives, and we actually have waiting lists for all services. We also have been able to obtain better educated young Americans. In 1980 only 68 percent of our new recruits had high school diplomas. Now over 89 percent are graduates, compared to only 75 percent of our nation's youth. For the past year and a half we have recruited a higher percentage of high school graduates than ever before, even during the draft.

Retention is also up dramatically. So far this year, over 70 percent of all eligible personnel have reenlisted, compared to only 55 percent in 1980. Indeed, the revitalization of our all volunteer force has been one of the earliest and best successes of the Reagan defense program, a reflection not just of better pay and benefits, but also of recognition by servicemen and women that, as the President is fond of saying, it is once again an honor to wear the uniform.

Another major problem we inherited from the last decade was the deterioration in sustainability—the ability of our forces to continue fighting in the event of a prolonged conventional war. Stocks of spare parts and munitions had been at precariously low levels for years. The dangers of this situation became all the more apparent as evidence mounted of the Warsaw Pact's ability to conduct high intensity, non-nuclear warfare beyond the first weeks of combat.

Therefore, in addition to budgeting for improvements in readiness, we also had to budget for unglamorous, yet essential items such as replacement equipment, spare parts, ammunition, fuel, and other essential consumables. We have been increasing the real dollar funding for sustainability; in FY 1984 our request of $12.3 billion is more than double the $5 billion funded in the last year of the Carter administration. By the time the material appropriated in this year's budget is delivered we will have increased our ability to sustain combat by 25 percent over the levels we had in 1980.

With these improvements to the basic readiness and staying power of our forces—many of which have been already accomplished, we are achieving the first part of our "double duty" assignment. By spending funds so that we are now more ready to meet an immediate crisis, we buy ourselves the best insurance that such a crisis will not be forced upon us. Indeed, if we fulfill all our objectives and hopes we will never have to use any of those things that are necessary to acquire now if we are to maintain our deterrent strength.

In some ways the second half of the double-duty we inherited—obsolescent equipment—was the more serious, because it would be more expensive to fix and take longer to remedy. As I said earlier, when this administration took office we found that the capability of our conventional forces had been badly neglected, at a time when Soviet forces were becoming increasingly sophisticated. This called into doubt our ability to protect critical U.S. interests around the world now and in the future. An independent estimate indicated that our defense "capital stock", the value of all our equipment and supplies on hand, had actually declined by almost 20 percent during the 1970's. Many of our combat units suffered from severe equipment shortfalls in armored personnel carriers, aircraft and ships—or were equipped with obsolete hardware. The Joint Chiefs of Staff and other experts warned of a "hollow" Army, a shrinking Navy, and an aging Air Force.

During the past 2 1/2 years we have taken steps to reverse this trend, and we are receiving the first deliveries of more and newer equipment into our forces. I hasten to add that we are not pursuing technology for technology's sake, but because we must counter the superior quantity and improved quality of our adversaries' weapons with equipment which is at least as good.

It is particularly galling to note that much of what we must acquire is to compensate for modernized Soviet weapons which display new technologies either stolen or purchased legally from the West. For example, we recently discovered a Soviet listening device planted off the West Coast, near our Trident missile test range. The microelectronics in the Soviet system, although made in the Soviet Union, are a replica of those manufactured in the United States.

One of the improved Soviet weapons systems is the Backfire Bomber and its new anti-ship missiles—which present a new threat to our maritime forces.

These anti-ship missiles are faster and can fly higher than their predecessors. The Backfire Bomber itself can fly faster and farther, and is able to launch its missiles farther away from the target, thus posing a new long-distance threat to our fleet.

To defend against this new Soviet threat, we are improving our early-warning radar capability to see "over the horizon" in order to detect these longer range bombers. We are also enhancing our fighters with better weapons of improved range to intercept the Backfire before it launches its missiles. Because we cannot hope to destroy all the bombers before they launch their missiles, we also have developed the aegis, a missile defense system mounted on a cruiser. The Aegis has an improved ability to detect both low- and high-flying missiles, and can track and engage a large number of missiles simultaneously.

Adding new technology, such as that used in the fleet defense system I have just described, is expensive and, because it is at technology's cutting edge, can be expected to experience delays or problems in initial development and testing. That is why we are particularly pleased that so many of our new high technology weapons are entering the inventory ahead of time and under or at the estimated cost.

Two of our biggest successes are the new M-1 Abrams tank and the B-1B bomber. The initial bugs are now out of the M-1 and we are buying it at the efficient rate of 720 per year. Although the M-1 is about 30 percent more expensive than its 21-year-old predecessor, the M-60, it is vastly more effective. The M-1 is the fastest and most agile tank in the world today. After only a two year production run, it is already averaging over 350 mean miles between failures. This compares to the roughly 240 mean miles between failure which the M-60 attained after 12 years in production. The M-1 is significantly more agile than the M-60 and provides a more effective capability to fire while moving at high speeds of 35-40 miles per hour with good accuracy and effectiveness both day and night. This capability adds significantly to the tanks already substantial levels of survivability. The addition of the M–1 tank to our force definitely adds to the credibility of our conventional deterrent.

The B–1B Bomber is another success story. Last week I had an update briefing on the B–1B. The B–1 has undergone eleven test flights since March 23 and the results have so exceeded our expectations that we now anticipate the first flight of the actual production run could be three to 5 months ahead of schedule, thus moving up full-scale production. The best news of all is that the four major contractors all claim lower than projected costs for a 1.4 to 4.4 percent cost underrun. We believe many of these weapons procurement success stories are due to our management reforms and campaign to increase the number of defense contracts let on a competitive bid basis.

We have made a good beginning. After 2 1/2 years of the Reagan defense program, the basic readiness and sustainability of our forces is improving dramatically. Our program to replace aging and obsolescent equipment with modernized systems is well under way.

Let me conclude by making two points. The first is that we must develop a responsible and balanced understanding of the real meaning of the threat we face. The detailed facts are clear enough. But there is great resistance to accepting the real meaning of these facts, because to do so is to accept the need for a major sustained response. Confronted as we are by all manner of other real or apparent needs, there is a temptation to argue away even the most overwhelming evidence, with misplaced hope that we can continue as usual, putting off or cancelling unpopular military necessities, and increasing our spending on more politically popular domestic programs. Instead, the regrettable fact is that, in view of the threats posed to our national security, this course is no longer open to us.

We must also recognize that the commitment to deterrence and defense is neither easy nor inexpensive. When it confronts an opposing coercive "offensive" strategy, it requires continued vigilance to maintain. When deterrence succeeds, it is easy to attribute the maintenance of peace not to the contribution of the defense that enforces the deterrent, but to a host of more facile assumptions—some imagined new-found "peaceful intent" of the opponent, the spirit of detente, growing economic interdependency, and so forth. When deterrence fails, however, and the opponent has deliberately weighed the risks and still decided to attack, the dividends of a viable defense are unquestionable. But unless such a defense is acquired, is in being, and is maintained at the ready, it is too late to try to regain it after war begins.

My second point is that this administration, in accepting its double duty of preparing our forces to meet a present crisis and equipping them for the future, has also accepted a political risk. It would be tempting to skimp on readiness, or to eat into our ammunition stockpiles once again. It would be tempting to let the next few administrations worry about the state of our military forces a decade from now. We could have tried to get by with tough rhetoric and a few showy new programs.

But the President is not willing, I am not willing, and I believe that ultimately the American people are not willing to pass on the legacy of neglect which we inherited. It would be unfair to our children; and it would be unsafe for ourselves.

I have given you good news today. But it is good news of progress, not of completion. Our improvements in readiness and sustainability would evaporate if we once again starved these areas of funds. A halt to our force modernization program would waste billions of dollars already invested, and leave us, if anything, even more vulnerable to Soviet aggressions. A strong and affordable defense is within our grasp. Now is not the time to draw back.

Letter From President Reagan to Members of the House of Representatives, July 19, 1983 [57]

Production of the MX Missile

This week the House will consider Title III of the fiscal year 1984 Defense authorization bill which implements the bipartisan recommendations of the Scowcroft Commission. Endorsing these recommendations will give this Nation a very solid chance to secure a balanced, verifiable arms reduction that, through greater stability, can make our Nation, our world, our people safer. In terms of speaking with one bipartisan voice, of standing up for U.S. vital interests and of strengthening America's agenda for peace, this vote is of special significance.

When I endorsed the entire Scowcroft Commission Report, I did so by recounting a quote from the report's conclusion: "If we can begin to see ourselves in dealing with the issues, not as political partisans or as crusaders for one specific solution to a part of this complex set of problems, but rather as citizens of a great Nation with the humbling obligation to persevere in the long-run task of preserving both peace and liberty for the world, a common perspective may finally be found."

These words, which guided the Commission, were instrumental in forging that bipartisanship which aims for deep reductions in both the U.S. and Soviet strategic arsenals, coupled with necessary modernization of our strategic forces in a way which will enhance stability.

Andrei Sakharov, the distinguished Soviet physicist and Nobel laureate, made a supporting argument to those aims when he stated in a recent letter that "arms control talks with the Soviets would be much easier if the United States were to have the MX albeit only potentially." [58]

The MX Peacekeeper is being built, as an integral part of the bipartisan Scowcroft Commission's package, to strengthen deterrence. It also provides vital negotiating leverage in Geneva. That lever is working.

Although the Commission called for the deployment of 100 missiles, the level ultimately deployed will be influenced by the outcome in Geneva. If an agreement is reached which calls for deep reductions—which is our goal—the number of missiles could certainly be adjusted downward.

We need the MX, not only for force modernization, but to keep the Soviets moving at the negotiation tables. That is why congressional endorsement of the Scowcroft Commission recommendations, as embodied in Title III of the Defense authorization bill, is so important. [59]

The American people believe that this should not be a partisan issue. I hope that I can count on your help to implement all elements of the Scowcroft Commission recommendations. Together we can ensure a continuing national consensus that can lead to the eventual elimination of all nuclear weapons.

Sincerely,

closed the books on a long, dark period of failure and self doubt and set a new course. With your continuing support and the support of millions of other patriotic, God-fearing Americans we have come a long way. But the task we face is still a challenging one and a lot of hard work remains to be done. But let's be sure we know what needs to be done.

We've got a few people in Washington who don't want to hear when we tell of our arms control and strategic modernization program and America's responsibility to protect peace and freedom. My own concern with these issues is nothing new, as many of you know. Three years ago at your Boston convention, I pledged to restore America's military posture so that we could promote peace while safeguarding our freedom and security.[61] With the help of groups like the Legion, we've kept that pledge. (Applause)

Our military forces are back on their feet and standing tall. Modern equipment is being delivered to the troops, training is way up, and combat readiness rates have really soared. And, once again, young Americans wear their uniforms and serve their flag with pride. (Applause)

We're getting and keeping very good people in all of the services. We've made great progress, and we're going to make more, and I hope that makes you as proud as it does me. (Applause)

I have to interrupt and tell you a little thing, and I don't mean this to—these young men and women in our armed services are hostile and warlike. They know that they're the peacekeepers. But an ambassador wrote me a letter, our Ambassador to Luxembourg,[62] and he said he had been up in the East German frontier and visiting the 2d Armored Cavalry Regiment, and as he went back to his helicopter, he was followed by a young 19-year-old trooper and the young man asked him if he thought he could get a message to me. Well, being an ambassador, he allowed as how he could. And the kid said well, would you tell him we're proud to be here and we ain't scared of nothing. (Applause)

But while I'm on the subject of our military forces I want to reaffirm our determination to account for every brave American who served in Southeast Asia. (Applause) This administration has not forgotten and will never forget the sacrifices that they and their families have made. And we will not rest until the fullest possible accounting has been made. (Applause)

The other half of restoring our military posture concerns our strategic forces. In the past, we paid a grim price for indecision and neglect—for a one-way restraint that was never returned by the other side. The resulting imbalance weakened the credibility of our nuclear deterrent—the deterrent that has been the single greatest bulwark for peace in the postwar era. While past American leaders hesitated or naively hoped for the best, the Soviet Union was left free to pile up new nuclear arsenals without any real incentives to seriously negotiate reductions.

Well, history doesn't offer many crystal clear lessons for those who manage our Nation's affairs. But there are a few, and one of them is surely the lesson that weakness on the part of those who cherish freedom inevitably leads to trouble—that it only encourages the enemies of both peace and freedom. On the other hand, history teaches us that by being strong and resolute we can keep the peace—and even reduce the threats to peace. (Applause)

And that was why, at your Boston convention in 1980, I pledged to strive for arms reduction agreements—not so-called arms control agreements that permitted further growth, but real arms reductions.

We've kept that pledge, too. For the past 2 1/2 years, this administration has steadfastly followed a dual-track of deterrence through modernization and the search for a more stable peace through arms reduction negotiations.

There is no contradiction in this dual approach, despite what some of the critics in Washington might have you believe. The restoration of a credible deterrent and the search for real arms reductions and stability are two sides of the same coin—a coin that is inscribed with the words, peace and security.

Now, our efforts are designed to sustain peace, plain and simple. We don't seek an arms race; indeed, we seek to reverse the trends that cause it by beginning to lower the levels of the nuclear arms. But we will not, and we cannot, accept anything that would be detrimental to our security and to the freedom and safety of our children and our grandchildren.

And that's what is so important about the MX. The MX Peacekeeper missile and our program to develop a new, small, single-warhead missile are critical to our country's present and future safety. They will maintain state-of-the-art readiness against the Soviets' already modernized systems. They will also ensure stability and deterrence, making it clear that aggression by the Soviet Union would never pay. And they're an essential incentive—(Applause)—they're an essential incentive for the Soviets to negotiate seriously for genuine arms reduction so that we can move to a more stable world in which the risk of war is reduced.

Modernization goes hand in hand with deterrence. Both are necessary incentives for successful negotiations.

Many of our critics willfully ignore this interrelationship. Instead, they focus their attention and their criticism on some single point which doesn't address the central issue. Often, it's based on wishful thinking or downright misinformation.

For example, one argument contends that the MX Peacekeeper would pose a first-strike threat to the Soviet Union. In the most fundamental sense, this argument runs counter to the whole history of America. Our country has never started a war, and we've never sought, nor will we ever develop a strategic first-strike capability. Our sole objective is deterrence, the strength and credibility it takes to prevent war. And in any case, there is no way that the MX, even with the remaining Minuteman force, could knock out the entire Soviet ICBM force, so the argument is a false one, both philosophically and technically.

What we really want, and what we would have with the MX in place is enough force that tells the enemy we'd do them a lot of damage. (Applause)

But the example that I have given is typical of the twisted logic of the anti-MX lobby. It reminds me of the tale told of an armed services poker game which took place a few years back on a Western military base. The MP's were tipped off, raided the barracks, and the four poker players just managed to hide the cards and poker chips in time. When the police got there, they were sitting at an empty table, staring innocently at each other. And the MP sergeant asked each one in turn if he'd been gambling, and the soldier bit his lip and replied, "No, Sarge, I haven't been gambling, and the airman answered the same way, and that finally brought them to the marine. And the said, "Have you been gambling?" And the M.P. [marine] looked the cop right dead in the eye and asked, "Who with?" (Laughter)

That was quick thinking, but the marines sure avoided a real issue, and the real issue is what counts. The real national defense issue of our time is maintaining deterrence while seeking arms reduction. And today, I'm pleased to be able to report some good news on the negotiating front. Our fundamental negotiating positions in both the START and INF talks have been strengthened by a number of related developments that have occurred this year. Let me share a few of them with you.

First on the list is that strong bipartisan support is beginning to surface for our strategic program. Starting with the perceptive recommendations of the Scowcroft Commission, and strengthened by the bipartisan Congressional support in strategic modernization votes in May and July, America has finally begun to forge a national consensus for peace and security. The MX Peacekeeper program and the development program for a new, small, single-warhead missile will complement the B–1 bomber and Trident submarine programs, the other legs of the Triad. But we aren't over the hump yet. There is still work to be done, and I am counting on your continuing and active support as we approach the next legislative round on appropriations for the MX this autumn.

If we see this mission through, the combined efforts of this administration and the Congress will restore the credibility of America's strategic posture—the essential foundation for deterrence and successful negotiations. We've learned over and again that only common resolve in the West can bring responsiveness from the East.

And fortunately, Western allied unity today is a firm reality. Our negotiations have been preceded by close consultations with the Congress and with our allies. This process has continued during the negotiations in Geneva, and we've given our negotiators the flexibility to explore all possible avenues with the Soviets.

Peace is a beautiful word, but it is also freely used, and sometimes even abused. As I've said before, peace is an objective, not a policy. Those who fail to understand this do so at their peril. Neville Chamberlain thought of peace as a vague policy in the thirties, and the result brought us closer to World War II. Today's so-called "peace movement"—for all its modern hype and theatrics—makes the same old mistake. They would wage peace by weakening the free. And that just doesn't make sense. (Applause) My heart is with those who march for peace. I'd be at the head of the parade if I thought it would really serve the cause of peace. But the members of the real peace movement, the real peacekeepers and peacemakers, are people who understand that peace must be built on strength. And for that, the American people and free people everywhere owe all of you a deep debt of gratitude. (Applause)

Like you, our allies remain united in a common effort to strengthen both deterrence and the prospects for arms reduction through negotiations. They recognize the dangers to allied unity of Soviet propaganda and thinly-veiled threats—at causing NATO to abandon its dual-track decision to modernize and negotiate. If we lacked the will to provide a credible deterrent, then we could look forward to ever more aggressive Soviet behavior in the future. Because NATO understands this, NATO will persevere.

When you add it all up, despite the problems, there is strong reason for hope. This administration has worked very hard over the course of many months to refine our own negotiating objectives and positions. We've developed a sound, well-thought-out strategy to achieve them. We stand united with the Congress and our allies. Our strategic Triad is being modernized. We're negotiating arms reductions in good faith. And there's been encouraging movement in these negotiations. For the first time, in the START negotiations, the Soviets are willing to actually talk about actual reductions. In Vienna, at the Mutual Balanced Force Reduction Talks, the Soviet negotiators have shown movement on the verification issues needed to permit us to negotiate reductions in the conventional force safely. There has also been progress in discussing confidence-building measures. All these indicators, modest though they may seem, point in the same positive direction—new hope for arms reductions and a more secure world.

Let's not kid ourselves. There are lots of ambiguities and we've still got a long way to go, a long way from agreement. Plenty of tough, hard bargaining remains to be done at the negotiating table. But I can assure you that our highest priority is focused on this, the most challenging and important issue of our lifetimes, and we're making headway—for peace. (Applause)

Another issue of critical importance to all Americans—and one I view as the centerpiece of American foreign policy—concerns our responsibility as peacemaker.

We can't build a safe world with honorable intentions and good will alone. Achieving the fundamental goals our Nation seeks in world affairs—peace, human rights, economic progress, national independence, and international stability—means supporting our friends and defending our interests. Our commitment as peacemaker is focused on these goals. Right now this commitment is most visible in Central America, the Middle East and Africa.

Our policy in Central America is to help the people of that troubled region help themselves, help them to build a better life—to help them toward liberty and to help them reverse centuries of poverty and inequity.

And that's what they want, too. In Costa Rica, democracy and respect for human rights are a long and proud tradition. In Honduras, democratic institutions are taking root. In El Salvador, democracy is beginning to work even in the face of externally supported terrorism and guerrilla warfare.

We know that democracy in Central America will not be built overnight. But step by step, with humanitarian, economic and private sector assistance from the United States, it can and will be achieved.

And that's why we established the Caribbean Basin Initiative, a program designed to help the people in that region help themselves. The Caribbean Basin Initiative is based on a combination of trade and private investment incentives. We decided to listen and learn from what our neighbors have been saying for a long time—that the best thing we could do [is] to help them build a better, freer life for themselves. We agree and, though you wouldn't know it from some of the coverage, by far the greatest portion of our aid to Central America is humanitarian and economic.

Now there are some—in Moscow and Havana—who don't want to let our Caribbean neighbors solve their problems peacefully. They seek to impose their alien form of totalitarianism with bullets instead of ballots.

And that's why we are supporting a security shield for those nations that are threatened. Unless that shield is there, democracy, reform, economic development, and constructive dialogue and negotiations cannot survive and grow. Other than training our own troops, this is the only purpose behind our military exercises—to demonstrate our commitment to the free aspirations and sovereignty of our neighbors. (Applause)

I've said it before, and I'll say it again: Human rights means working at problems, not walking away from them. Would America be America if, in their hour of need, we abandoned our nearest neighbors? From the tip of Tierra del Fuego to Alaska's Point Barrow, we're all Americans. We worship the same God, cherish the same freedom. Can we stand idly by and allow a totalitarian minority to destroy our common heritage? Our concern is justice. Has communism ever provided that? Our concern is poverty. Has a communist economic system ever brought prosperity? No. If the United States were to let down the people of Central America—people who are struggling for the democratic values that we share—we would have let ourselves down, too. We could never be certain of ourselves, much less of the future, if we turned our back on our nearest neighbors' struggle for peace, freedom and evolving democracy. (Applause)

In the Middle East, the pursuit of peace between Israel and its Arab neighbors remains another fundamental objective of this administration. Yes, it's a thorny problem, and our negotiators have faced serious difficulties over the past 2 1/2 years. But there's been real progress. The Sinai Peninsula was returned to Egypt in April of 1982. This essential step in the establishment of peace between Egypt and Israel wouldn't have been possible without our decision to contribute to the multinational force and observers that are currently operating in the Sinai. In Lebanon, our Marines continue to serve alongside their French, British and Italian comrades as we work for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from that troubled land. Our joint presence strengthens the resolve of the Lebanese Government to assume the tough task of maintaining order.

We Americans covet no foreign territory, and we have no intention of becoming policeman to the world. But as the most powerful country in the West, we have a responsibility to help our friends keep the peace. And we should be proud of our achievements—(applause)—and especially proud of the fine men and women of our armed forces who undertake these tough yet vital tasks.

In Africa, we're engaged in a parallel commitment—economic development, the growth of democracies and the peaceful resolution of conflict. And here, too, our emphasis is on developmental and economic assistance. We maintain only a handful of military advisers on the whole African Continent. Our economic aid is four times larger than what we spend on security assistance. Contrast this with what the Soviet Union is doing. The record shows that since the Soviets began their aid program to Africa in 1954, military aid has outpaced all other Soviet aid by seven-to-one. Then add more than 40,000 Soviet and surrogate military personnel stationed in Africa, and it's no wonder that Africa is rife with conflict and tension.

For our part, we're actively working to defuse the tensions and conflict in Namibia and Angola while we help fight poverty in the region. In Chad, the United States is a partner in a multinational economic assistance package designed to get this tragically poor and strifetorn country on its feet. But without protection from external aggression, there can be no economic progress.

And naked, external aggression is what is taking place in Chad today. Drawing upon the nearly $10 billion worth of Soviet military equipment and munitions now in Libya, Colonel Qadhaffi has been using Soviet-built fighter bombers, T–55 tanks and artillery in a blatant attempt to destroy a legitimate government. President Habre and the people of his country are truly beleaguered as they struggle to preserve their independence. It is in this context that we have joined a number of other contries in providing emergency security assistance to Chad.

Yes, in Africa there is real reason for concern. But there are also harbingers of hope. Less than two weeks ago, I had the pleasure of meeting with President Diouf of Senegal. He's a great man doing a great job. His outstanding leadership has brought Senegal fully into the community of truly democratic states. And a similar democratic success story has just taken place in Nigeria, Africa's most populous nation, where free Presidential elections were successfully completed last week.

That's right, there's a democratic revolution going on in this world. It may not grab the headlines, but it's there, and it's growing. The tide of history is with the forces of freedom—and so are we.

That's the real message—(applause)—and that's the overwhelming news story of our time, even though it seldom makes the front page. The light of the democratic ideal is not slowly fading away. It gains in brightness with every passing day, but it needs our care and cultivation.

You know, Mark Twain once remarked that he spent $25 to research his family tree, and then he had to spend $50 to cover it up. (Laughter) Well, America is more fortunate. We can be proud of our heritage, and we need never hide from our roots. The world we live in is not an easy one, but we have inherited a noble mission, a mission that casts a beacon of hope for all the Earth's people. America, more than anything, wants lasting peace—peace with liberty, with justice, and with the freedom to follow the dictates of God and conscience. To succeed, we will need wisdom, strength, and imagination. We'll need patience and vigor. But to seek anything less would be to deny our heritage and the real meaning of our great Nation.

You know, our National Anthem is probably the only one that asks a question: "does that banner still wave o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?" When Francis Scott Key wrote that he was asking if our flag was still flying. Well, today, we know the flag still flies. But what we continue to answer is that it does wave o'er a people that are still free and still brave and determined to preserve this land for generations to come. (Applause)

Thank you for all that you and the Legion are doing to help America stay true to this quest, and God bless you all.

Thank you. (Applause)

Preserving Peace Through Deterrence

Since taking office, I have traveled to 48 States, 3 United States territories, and 47 foreign countries. Everywhere I have gone, leaders and ordinary citizens alike have voiced one concern above all others: the need to avoid nuclear war. Our Government has set policies in place that, if adhered to, will keep such a war from ever taking place.

For nearly 40 years—years spanning Republican and Democratic Presidencies—the United States has pursued a consistent, twofold program to maintain nuclear peace.

Our first aim has been effective deterrence. We have made certain that our adversaries understand that a nuclear strike against us or our allies would result in retaliation. That sounds chilling, but by keeping our deterrent forces strong enough to be credible, we have avoided the need to use them. In Europe, where our deterrent efforts have been focused, there has been peace since 1945. In the rest of the world, more than 100 wars have taken place.

[63] Source: Press Release, November 21, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the Vice President.

Our second aim has been genuine arms control—a persistent, dedicated effort to reach agreements with other nuclear powers that would control the production and testing of weapons. Such agreements include the Test Ban Treaty signed by John F. Kennedy in 1963, and the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty signed by Richard M. Nixon in 1972.

Throughout these almost four decades, this program has placed burdens on our nation. We have had to spend large amounts of money on defense, station thousands of troops far from home, and learn to live with the pressures involved in maintaining our freedoms in the nuclear age. As protesters march and rally in the days and months ahead, we would do well to remember that despite its costs, this program has succeeded in keeping the peace.

The gravest threat to this peace emerged in the 1970s. It was then that the Soviet Union embarked on an arms buildup so vast it lacked any parallel in history—a buildup that continues today. In many categories of conventional and nuclear forces, the Russians have achieved superiority. One such category much in the news is that of intermediate-range nuclear forces in Europe. The Russians began to deploy new and threatening missiles in 1977, and today they have more than 1,000 warheads aimed at targets throughout Western Europe. Our European allies were alarmed by the creation of a Soviet nuclear monopoly in this category of weapons. The deployments we are carrying out today, the first in many years, respond to a request from our NATO allies, to which we agreed in 1979.

The Russians have threatened to walk out of the talks on intermediate-range nuclear forces, in Geneva, and this they may do. We would remain at the table, ready and willing to negotiate seriously; and we are certain that the Russians eventually would return. They know as well as we that nuclear arms reduction talks must succeed for the sake of us all, Russians and Americans alike.

In addition, we are engaged in three other arms negotiations with the Soviet Union. These cover nuclear, chemical and conventional weapons. These are all serious negotiations, to which the United States is committed.

President Reagan has directed the Defense Department to study the feasibility of developing a strategic nuclear defense—one that would destroy hostile strategic nuclear missiles in space. If this defense could be perfected, it could help lift the shadow of nuclear war from everyone.

The President's leadership in each of these initiatives is a reflection of his commitment to arms reductions. Some have voiced doubts about the President's commitment. I, who see him daily, know that it is deep, sincere and abiding. To this end, in 1981 we removed 1,000 nuclear weapons from Europe. We have recently decided to remove 1,400 more tactical weapons from Europe.

I believe President Reagan has the best chance of any recent President to achieve genuine arms reductions.

My own view of war and its horrors first came in the prenuclear era. At the age of 19, as a torpedo bomber pilot, I was shot down in the Pacific and was the only survivor of my plane's crew. That experience, vivid in my memory, has been a constant incentive for me to do all in my power to see that my children and grandchildren can grow up and not have to face the dangers of war—either as combatants or innocent victims.

I am convinced, from all I have seen here and abroad, that our policy of strength, deterrence and serious negotiation holds open the door to lasting peace. There are no "quick fixes" available to us. The price of peace and freedom includes courage and determination and patience. The American people have these qualities in abundance, and I urge you to join us in pursuing the policies of peace and deterrence that have worked so well for so long.

Remarks by President Reagan, December 14, 1983 (Extract) [64]

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. President, I'm Bob Brenner from Olympia, Washington. Do you, currently, have any contingency plan that might include reducing military spending as a way to decrease the deficit?

THE PRESIDENT. On military spending—I ran on the idea that we had been starving our military for so long that there really was a window of vulnerability. I think we've closed, largely, that window of vulnerability. We haven't closed it completely. We haven't caught totally up. But we've made a great difference.

Now, with malice of forethought, I asked Cap Weinberger to take that job. He was my Finance Director, for a time, when I was Governor. And he didn't earn the name "Cap, the Knife" for nothing. (Laughter.)

But what everyone, particularly in the Congress, seems unwilling to admit is that they have been, themselves—over there, under his direction, reducing the budgets as they find ways to save and ways to improve. All these horror stories recently about the high price of spare parts—those are our figures. We're the ones who found those high prices. And we're the ones who are doing something about it. And we've already had a number of indictments. We have had refunds. And we've had dismissals of personnel; we're getting at that. We sent some inspectors out that were mean as junkyard dogs, and they found that this was going on. But, the way I feel that we have to look at defense is this: You look at defense not as how much do we want to spend. What is necessary to assure our national security? What weapon systems? What numbers of personnel and all? And once you've decided on that, then you figure out—and figuring just as sharply as you can with a sharp pencil—what does it cost to provide that kind of national security? And if you've gotten it down to where all the waste is out, and we've taken advantage of our reduction of inflation below what our anticipation was, I can tell that right now the defense budget that is presently being talked about has been cut by the Secretary of Defense $16 billion, before he came in with it.

Now, to go to the Congress with this and then have them say, "Oh no, we only want to spend 'X' number of dollars," then you have to say to the Congress, "All right, then what is it that you want to do without? What weapon system do you want to do away with? Or do you want to cut the pay for the military?" I can tell you that when I started here, everyone said that we would have to reinstitute the draft, that the volunteer military would never work. Would you be interested to know that it not only has worked—I get a lump in my throat when I see those people out there, those young men and young women in uniform. Their esprit de corps, their pride—and would it interest you to know that we have the highest percentage of high school graduates in the military that we have ever had in our history—even back in wartime when we were drafting so many millions. We have the highest percentage above average—the average intelligence level in the military. We have a waiting line of people who want to enlist in the service. We have the highest retention now of non-commissioned officers.

When we came here the first year, if we had gone to a draft, we didn't have enough non-commissioned officers to train the draftees, and that's all changed. And I tell you, when I get a letter from a hundred Marines stationed over in Europe, and those Marines write me, as they did about a year ago in the budget talk, and say, "If giving us a pay cut will help our country, cut our pay." I wouldn't cut their pay if I bled to death. The response from them, all of them, is just so remarkable. Their pride, their—I've made a lot of telephone calls, lately, tragic calls, to families of those who lost their lives. And I hang up the phone in worse shape than they were on the phone. I never heard such pride, I never heard such willingness to accept that this was necessary. And I've learned the hardest thing that a President will ever have to do, as far as I'm concerned, is issue an order that some of our uniformed personnel have to go into an area where there is a possibility of harm to them. That's the one—that's the only problem that ever causes me to lose sleep.

But, now, I think the military budget, the defense budget—incidentally, when we set out over a five-year period, we had expected to increase over the Carter projections for the next five years, $116 billion. We have already, ourselves, cut $79 billion out of that $116 billion increase, and still we have a military that is further up to readiness—well, you saw the result in Grenada. And I wish you could all have been on the South Lawn when about 400 of those students from Grenada came there at our invitation, and we had 40 of the military back from Grenada from all four branches. And to see them, all the same age, roughly, the medical students and the military, and to see those students. They couldn't keep their hands off those young men in uniform. Everyone wanted to tell them personally that they had saved their lives.

I had some come up to me and tell me that when they were escorted to the helicopters and there had been gunfire all around, that our men in uniform placed themselves in a position that if there was firing on them, they would be hit, not the students. They shielded the students with their bodies. And it was a wonderful thing to see.

I've gotten a great deal of hope and optimism about the future of this country now, having weathered all the riots on the campus when I was a governor, to now see the quality of these young people and their dedication.

I didn't mean to make a speech, but I can't help it. I'm all wound up on that particular subject.

Chapter 4. Arms Control

Document 32

Statement by President Reagan, January 14, 1983 [1]

Leverage and Determination Are Essential to Success in Arms Control

Ladies and gentlemen, I have a statement here. But before I begin, I just want to explain the subject of this. There has been such disarray approaching chaos in the press corps with regard to the subject of arms control that I thought before you unraveled into complete disorder that maybe we should straighten out the entire subject. So, before taking your questions, I'll express a thought or two which are a matter of deep conviction for me with regard to arms control. These concern what we must do before we can expect to be successful and then what principles ought to guide us in our negotiating strategy.

First, it seems to me that the two factors that are essential to success in arms control are leverage and determination. With respect to leverage, it's clear that when I arrived in office there was virtually no hope that we could expect the Soviets to bargain seriously for real reductions. After all, they had all the marbles. We hadn't designed a new missile in 15 years. We hadn't built a new submarine in the same period although they had built more than 60. Our bombers were older than the pilots who flew them. Today that's no longer the case. Working with the Congress, we have in the past two years succeeded in getting authorization for a complete modernization of the triad of strategic forces with the exception of the MX which still requires congressional action this spring.

My point is that now we're in a position to get somewhere and I'm determined that we shall. The other quality I mentioned was determination. Recently I've made a few management changes so that we'll have a streamlined team in place through which we can reach decisions promptly and get results in the Geneva talks. [2]

I want to say something else about my strategy toward arms control. It seems to me that if you look back over the history of the past 15 years of talks, certain things emerge. Frankly, some things have worked and others have not.

Let me be specific. Some people have argued that we ought to try unilateral disarmament—that we should cut our own systems without getting anything from them in return in the hope that our example will lead the Soviets to cut theirs. That approach has been tried on a number of occasions. For example, President Carter decided to cut the B–1 bomber perhaps in the expectation that the Soviets would cut back on their bomber programs. It didn't work. Instead of cutting back the Soviets went steadily ahead with the Backfire and another advanced bomber.

On the other hand, some things have worked. Most of you recall that in the late sixties President Johnson tried very hard to engage the Soviets in talks on antiballistic missile systems. At the time we had no deployment planned; in short, no leverage. The Soviets refused to talk.

But then the United States decided to go ahead with an ABM plan, and you know the rest. When it became clear that we would go ahead with the deployment the Soviets came to the table and we got a treaty that still endures today. [3]

The lesson is that they will bargain when they have an incentive, and today that incentive exists and I am convinced that we can make real progress.

It is with this thought in mind that I had an in-depth meeting yesterday on arms control with some of my arms control advisors. Next week I will be meeting with Ambassadors Ed Rowny and Paul Nitze. We are ready and I am confident that with determination we can succeed. Keeping in mind our commitment to the security of Europe and to peace, and in order to insure the closest possible coordination with our European allies on arms reductions and deterrents, I have asked Vice President Bush to go to Europe for talks with my European counterparts.

And while he is there the Vice President will meet with the Pope, Prime Minister Thatcher, Chancellor Kohl, President Mitterrand, Prime Minister Fanfani, Prime Minister Martens, and Prime Minister Lubbers, as well as with our negotiating teams in Geneva.

And let there be no doubt, we are ready. We will consider every serious proposal and we have the determination to succeed in this, the most important undertaking of our generation.

Address by Vice President Bush Before the U.N. Committee on Disarmament, Geneva, Switzerland, February 4, 1983 [4]

Fostering World Peace Through Arms Control and Agreements That Enhance International Security and Stability

No city has done more than Geneva to advance man's oldest, yet seemingly most elusive, dream—to live at peace with his neighbors. This is the city of Rousseau, who taught us that man is born both free and good, a concept that has had the most profound effect upon my country, and many others as well. It was near here that Voltaire made his home when his incisive, but often irreverent, mind brought down upon him the displeasure of his king. After the calamity of the First World War, the League of Nations was established and housed in this very building, in the hope that here in the free city of Geneva this embodiment of man's best intentions might prosper.

Today, the world's hopes for peace are once again focused on this city. Two vital bilateral negotiations [5] are underway here, with a single aim: to make significant reductions in the nuclear arsenals of the United States and the Soviet Union, and thereby to strengthen international stability and to increase the security of all states. And, in this committee, multilateral efforts are in train to deal with other urgent arms control issues: how to eliminate chemical weapons from the world's arsenals; how to effectively verify limitations on nuclear testing; how to approach the question of possible further arms control measures affecting outer space.

[4] Source: Press Release, February 4, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the Vice President; also printed in Department of State Bulletin, March 1983, pp. 14–18.

[5] Reference is to the third round of the START talks between the United States and the Soviet Union, which began on February 2, 1983, in Geneva. The talks had been in recess since December 1982. The second reference is to the INF talks.

My message to you is simple and unequivocal: the United States will do all that it can to create a foundation for enduring world peace through arms control and through agreements that enhance international security and stability. This task is the President's highest priority, and he has asked me to tell you that we will pursue sound and workable arms control initiatives with the utmost determination. But we will not hesitate to differ with approaches which are not sound, or do not hold out the prospect of effective, verifiable agreements.

What are the prospects for progress here in Geneva? I would like to set forth the views of the United States on the status of our efforts—both bilateral and multilateral—to advance the cause of peace by reaching agreement on effective arms control measures.

President Reagan assumed office at a time of increasing concern among the American people over the behavior of the Soviet Union and its allies. In its foreign policy, as well as in the relentless buildup of its military forces, the Soviet Union has appeared determined to advance its own interests at the expense of everyone else's. This determination was reflected in the invasion of Afghanistan; in the suppression of human rights in Poland; the use of chemical and toxin weapons in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan in violation of customary international law and existing international conventions; and in the steady accumulation of vast amounts of modern weaponry far beyond any reasonable requirements for defense.

Clearly, Soviet behavior required a revitalization of our own defense, which in many measures of military power had been outstripped. The United States has undertaken this effort not with a view toward conquest or intimidation, but rather to maintain our ability to deter aggression, and thus to defend our vital interests and those of our friends and allies against threat or coercion. I know that President Reagan would much prefer to spend our resources on other pursuits. But we will do what is necessary to defend our interests and preserve the peace.

But providing the means of defense is only one aspect of ensuring one's security. The Reagan Administration believes that arms control measures can be a vital part of our national security, and that equitable and effective verifiable arms control agreements can increase that security. One of the first actions taken by President Reagan was to launch the most thorough review of our arms control policy ever undertaken by any new administration. A new approach to arms control was necessary to deal with the changed situation in which the United States found itself as a result of Soviet actions over the previous decade. Arms control had not become less important. Indeed, effective arms control had, if anything, become more important, since the military balance, at all levels, had become more unstable.

President Reagan announced the general principles which guide our arms control efforts in a statement on November 18, 1981. [6] They are worth repeating here:

—First, the United States seeks to reduce substantially the number of potentially destructive nuclear weapons, not just to freeze them at high levels, as has been the case in previous agreements.

—Second, we seek agreements that will lead to mutual reductions to equal levels in both sides' forces. An unequal agreement, like an unequal balance of forces, can encourage aggression.

—Third, we seek agreements that will enhance the security of the United States and its allies, and that will reduce the risk of war. Arms control is not an end in itself, but a vital means toward ensuring peace and international stability.

—Fourth, we will carefully design the provisions of arms control agreements, and insist on measures to ensure that all parties comply.

In other words, we will insist that agreements must be verifiable. Otherwise, the parties cannot have confidence that all are abiding by the provisions of an agreement. This is particularly important in the nuclear area, where we have proposed deep cuts in the U.S. and Soviet arsenals. It is also vital to our efforts in this committee to ban chemical weapons, and to develop effective limitations on nuclear testing.

Based on these objectives, my government has since then advanced a dynamic program of arms control initiatives—in our bilateral negotiations with the Soviet

Union, in the work of this committee, and—together with our allies—in the negotiations at Vienna on mutual and balanced force reductions in Europe.[7] Let me now deal with those which are of particular interest to the members of this committee.

The problem of achieving reductions in the world's nuclear arsenals is our most important challenge. The United States has met this challenge by developing what President Reagan has called the most comprehensive program of nuclear arms control ever proposed by my country. These proposals are on the negotiating table here in Geneva—in the intermediate range nuclear forces, or INF, negotiations, and in the START talks on reducing strategic nuclear forces.

The point I want to stress here is that the United States' proposals in the START negotiations entail deep and significant cuts in United States and Soviet nuclear arsenals—a 50 percent cut in our strategic ballistic missiles. In the INF negotiations, we have proposed the elimination of an entire class of weapons. They do so in a way which is balanced and which reduces the risk of war. This is, after all, what these negotiations are all about. Stability and security could be greatly enhanced if both sides thus reduced their arsenals, and it is precisely because of this that we have proposed such major reductions.

In the INF negotiations, there is now on the table a far-reaching United States proposal which would at a stroke ban an entire class of U.S. and Soviet longer-range INF missiles, the systems of greatest concern to both sides. The Soviet Union now has over 600 such missiles with some 1200 warheads, while the United States has—none. Under our proposal, the Soviet Union would be required to eliminate all of its ground-launched missiles of this type. These missiles—of the type referred to in the West as SS–4, SS–5 and SS–20—are in place now. The United States would be required to forgo the deployment of its roughly comparable missiles. As you know, they are scheduled to be deployed in Europe beginning this year under the decision taken by the NATO alliance.

[7] Reference is to the MBFR draft treaty tabled by NATO in Vienna on July 8, 1982.

The United States believes that any such agreement on nuclear forces must be effective and balanced; it must genuinely reduce the nuclear threat to both sides; it must enhance stability; and it must lessen the risk of conflict. Our proposal meets these criteria. Indeed, it strikes to the very heart of the problem.

Thus far, the proposals advanced in these negotiations by the Soviet Union have been designed to leave them with significant advantages, in particular a monopoly over the United States and her NATO allies in longer-range INF missiles. Indeed, the ideas recently advanced by General Secretary Andropov[8] continue to have this as their aim. We will, of course, continue to give the most serious consideration to any constructive Soviet proposal. Ours is not a take-it-or-leave-it proposition. However, the Soviet Union must recognize our legitimate security concerns in these talks. Ours is a moral position. What is wrong with eliminating from the face of the earth an entire class of new missiles? The only argument I have heard why we cannot eliminate INF missiles is that the Soviets are against it. Well, that arguement isn't good enough. I say to the Soviet leadership: come up with your own plan to banish these INF missiles. We are ready to consider initiatives that will achieve that goal.

As in the case of the negotiations on intermediate-range missiles, we are emphasizing in the START negotiations real and significant reductions in the levels of strategic armaments on both sides, down to equal ceilings. As President Reagan has pointed out, our proposals in these negotiations would eliminate some 4,700 warheads and 2,250 missiles from the combined nuclear arsenals of the United States and the Soviet Union.

We have been encouraged by the fact that the Soviet Union is negotiating seriously, and has accepted the concept of reduction, although we do not find their proposal sufficient. Their proposal fails to focus on the more destabilizing elements of strategic forces, ballistic missiles, and particularly ICBM's, and it does not go far enough in making the kind of deep reductions in ballistic missile forces that we believe to be necessary. However, we believe that the approaches provide a basis for negotiation, and we intend to explore avenues for achieving such reductions and to pursue the negotiations seriously and constructively.

[8] Reference may be to a statement by Soviet General Secretary Andropov on February 2, 1983. According to Andropov, the arms control proposals developed by the United States were "unrealistic." He also stated "that the USSR will not agree to unilateral disarmament." For text of his statement, see Current Digest of the Soviet Press, March 2, 1983, p. 6.

I will be meeting during my visit here in Geneva with the United States and Soviet delegations to both these critical negotiations. My purpose in doing so is to emphasize the great importance which the United States—and President Reagan personally—attaches to a successful outcome in both of them. I will convey to the negotiators the President's hope that they will press forward with speed and energy, and his wishes that their efforts will meet with success. I know that all of you share this hope.

Let me now turn, Mr. Chairman,[9] to the work directly before this committee, to which we also attach the highest importance.

The committee is confronted with numerous important issues. None has a higher priority for the United States than the efforts to ban forever an entire and different class of weapons from the world's arsenals. As President Reagan has stated, the goal of United States policy is to eliminate the threat of chemical warfare by achieving a complete and verifiable ban on chemical weapons.

The nations of the world have already prohibited the first use of chemical and biological weapons in the Geneva Protocol of 1925,[10] and have outlawed the possession of biological and toxin weapons in the 1972 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention.[11] Like most other nations at this table, the United States is a party to these treaties, and like most others, we are in full compliance with their provisions. Beyond the provisions of these treaties, there is an even broader moral prohibition against the use of these weapons. President Franklin Roosevelt perhaps expressed it best when he said that their use "has been outlawed by the general opinion of civilized mankind."

All forms of warfare are terrible. But these weapons are particularly to be feared, because of the human suffering they can inflict. This is why the civilized world has condemned their use. Sadly, mankind has, nonetheless, had repeated demonstrations of the cruelty and horror wrought by the use of these weapons. And now, chemical and toxin weapons are being used in Afghanistan and Southeast Asia in violation of international law and international arms control agreements. These violations are made all the worse by the fact that their victims have neither the means to deter the attacks against them, nor to defend or protect themselves against these barbaric weapons.

The United States presented conclusive evidence to the world community of the facts surrounding the use of chemical and toxin weapons. Others have presented evidence as well. We did not come to our conclusions rashly, but only after the most exhaustive study. The implications that flow from the use of these weapons are so serious that many would prefer to disbelieve or simply to ignore them. But we must face the facts.

The world's progress toward more civilized relations among states has been doggedly slow, and beset at every turn by fears, ambitions and rivalries among the nations. We cannot, therefore, allow the progress which we have made to be destroyed. To do so would be to begin a relentless slide back to a new dark age of mindless barbarism. This is what is at stake, and this is what we must prevent.

What must now be done? The United States has already called upon the Soviet Union and its allies to stop immediately their illegal use of these weapons. I repeat that call here today. And, I urge the Soviet Union, and all other members of the committee, to join the United States in negotiating a complete and effective and verifiable ban on the development, production, stockpiling, and transfer of chemical weapons, a ban that will ensure that these horrors can never occur again.

A complete, effective, and verifiable ban on chemical weapons is long overdue. My government, therefore, would like to see the work of this committee accelerated, and negotiations undertaken on a treaty to eliminate the threat posed by chemical weapons.

A number of key issues, of course, must be resolved if we are to be successful in negotiating such a treaty. In the coming days, the United States delegation will present to this committee a new document containing our detailed views on the content of a convention we believe could effectively—more specifically, verifiably—eliminate the chemical weapons threat.[12] We undertake this initiative with the aim of further advancing the work of the committee, and to encourage contributions and cooperation from others as well.

The key to an effective convention—one that could eliminate the possibility of chemical warfare forever—is the firm assurance of compliance through effective verification. This principle is fundamental. Effective verification, as the world's recent experience with the use of chemical and toxin weapons shows, is an absolute necessity for any future agreement. This is why the United States seeks a level of verification that will protect us, our allies, and indeed humanity itself. For today, the threat of chemical warfare has increased. And until an effective agreement can be achieved, the United States, just as others, must continue to ensure that it can deter the use of chemical weapons against its citizens and friends. If we are to expect nations ever to forego the ability to deter chemical warfare, those nations must have confidence that others who accept the prohibition cannot circumvent their obligations and later threaten the peace with chemical weapons. They must be certain that they will not be attacked with such weapons by any state which, like they, has foresworn chemical warfare. In short, for us, the verification and compliance provisions of a comprehensive chemical weapons treaty must be truly effective.

We know that most of the members of this committee, like us, are dedicated to accomplishing this important task. To do so will require more than our dedication, however; it will require greater willingness and flexibility on the part of the Soviet Union and its allies to work seriously and constructively on resolving the key outstanding issues—especially those pertaining to verification and compliance. And such issues must be resolved if we are to expect to make genuine progress. For although some may argue that progress could be made by concentrating on the "easier" issues, or even by drafting treaty text on them, this would be a fruitless exercise if the verification issues cannot be resolved. We will not support such a diversion of effort here.

I urge all members of this committee to begin negotiations this session to resolve the key issues that face us in this area, and to join with us in achieving a complete and verifiable ban on chemical weapons.

The committee is also faced with a number of nuclear arms control issues. The elimination of the threat of nuclear war is clearly of paramount importance to all of us, and the United States fully accepts its special responsibilities in this area. We are recognizing this responsibility in the most effective way we know—here in Geneva across the negotiating table from the Soviet Union.

At the same time, this committee has its role to play in the area of nuclear arms control. One of the major issues before it is that of [a] comprehensive ban on nuclear tests. Such a ban remains a long-term goal of United States policy, and we will continue to work toward its achievement. The work already done in the committee by the group of scientific experts on developing a world-wide system for monitoring of nuclear explosions has been valuable. Moreover, at the suggestion of the United States, this committee formed a working group last year to study issues of verification and compliance surrounding a nuclear test ban. Verification is one area, in particular, in which the United States believes greater progress must be made if we are to make progress towards a ban on nuclear tests. Therefore, we would hope that the committee will continue its work in this area this year.

My government believes that the negotiations in this body on a convention to ban radiological weapons offer the prospect of a modest, but real step forward, a step that could eliminate a potentially very dangerous type of weapon. Mr. Chairman, we should take it as a cardinal rule of this committee that when there is the prospect for real progress toward an agreement, we should pursue it to its conclusion. While there are a number of issues yet to be resolved, we believe that an agreement is within the committee's grasp, and that we should move ahead with all due speed to conclude the negotiations on this treaty.

I should also like to say a word about further arms control measures affecting outer space. The United States has been the leader in the peaceful exploration and use of outer space. We intend to continue this leadership. Some of these activities in outer space are important to our national security and that of our allies. They help to monitor the peace, to warn of the threat of war, to ensure proper command and control of our armed forces worldwide, to preserve our deterrent capability, and to assist in the verification of arms control agreements. The limited nuclear test ban treaty, the 1967 Outer Space Treaty, the Environmental Modification Treaty, and the Antiballistic Missile Treaty, which is one of the Salt I agreements,[13] all have important arms control provisions affecting outer space. Some are now asking whether additional measures might be called for and if so, what kind? The United States does not have the answer to this question, and we are continuing to study this issue. Clearly, the conditions do not exist which would make negotiations appropriate. We are, however, prepared to exchange views with other members of this committee, and believe the committee should address the matter in a more systematic way than it has in the past.

Finally, I would like to use this occasion to pay tribute to one among us here today whose tireless efforts over a lifetime of service were recently recognized when he was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.[14] Ambassador Garcia Robles' accomplishments are far too numerous for me to mention, but let me just say that I assure you, sir, of the full cooperation of the United States delegation in efforts to finish work on a realistic comprehensive program of disarmament.

Mr. Chairman, there is, in closing, one thought which I would like to leave with this committee, a thought which underlies our approach to arms control, and to the issues before this committee. And that is that the achievement of effective arms control agreements is difficult work. It requires dedication, persistence, tolerance, a respect for the views of others, and above all, a faith that conflict can be prevented, and that solutions can be found. The most dangerous view, particularly in this nuclear age, is that war is inevitable. I reject this view entirely, because such a belief merely increases the inclination to make a self-fulfilling prophecy. Let us rededicate ourselves in this committee, therefore, to the hard and serious work which is required to prevent war.

[13] The treaties referred to are respectively as follows: 14 UST 1313 (Test Ban), 18 UST 2410 (1967 Outer Space Treaty), 31 UST 333 (Environmental Modification Treaty), 23 UST 3455 (Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty), and 23 UST 3462 (Salt I).

[14] On October 13, 1982, the Nobel Committee of the Norwegian "Storting" awarded the 1982 Nobel Prize for peace to Alva Myrdal (Sweden) and Alfonso Garcia Robles (Mexico) for the central part each had played in the U.N. disarmament negotiations.

Statement by the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs (Eagleburger) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, February 24, 1983 [15]

The Arms Control Implications of Yellow Rain

I appreciate the opportunity to appear here today to discuss the arms control implications of the use of chemical and toxin weapons.

Our goal is to see their complete elimination. Our seriousness and dedication was shown most recently during Vice President Bush's trip to Europe. While in Geneva, he addressed the Committee on Disarmament [CD] [16] and spoke forcefully and persuasively of the need to rid the world of chemical and toxin weapons. He took the additional constructive step of announcing an important U.S. initiative to achieve that goal.

More than a dozen years ago we unilaterally renounced the possession of all biological and toxin weapons. Subsequently, we played a major role in negotiating an international agreement banning these weapons. [17] A large number of countries, including the Soviet Union, joined us in ratifying the treaty.

We expected that the threat of this whole class of weapons would disappear. Yet, that turned out to be a false hope. Toxin weapons are being used right now in Afghanistan and Southeast Asia. Repeated calls to cease the violation of international agreements go unheeded. The Soviet Union, Vietnam, and Laos continue to deny their acts, which we and others have documented.

We cannot, and will not, remain silent about the death and suffering caused by chemical and toxin weapons since the mid-1970's. Yet we know it is not sufficient merely to exhort the world to condemn those who supply and use them. Rather, we must constructively find a way to insure that these weapons are effectively abolished.

Toxins and chemical warfare agents have been developed in the Soviet Union and provided to Laos and Vietnam. The Soviets use these agents themselves in Afghanistan and have participated in their preparation and use in Southeast Asia. Neither the Vietnamese, Laotians, nor Afghans could have developed or produced these weapons. The Soviet Union can, however, and has extensively trained and equipped its forces for this type of warfare.

An incident which occurred in 1979 in Sverdlovsk in the Soviet Union raised questions as well about Soviet compliance with the prohibition on production of biological weapons. A sudden major pulmonary anthrax outbreak occurred near a suspected biological weapons facility. The Soviets' explanation—if one can call it that—continues to be inconsistent with available evidence.

Nearly 8 years ago, the world first heard of the use of lethal chemical weapons in Laos. In 1978, similar reports began coming out of Kampuchea, and in 1979 from Afghanistan. We have now accumulated a large body of evidence on the use of these weapons and the plight of their victims. The judgments are well documented and the facts do not support any other conclusion.

The United States has raised this issue publicly in the United Nations, with Congress, and elsewhere. We have issued a series of reports providing extensive evidence of these attacks and the agents used. The most recent report was submitted to the Congress and the United Nations by Secretary Shultz on November 29 of last year. [18]

Canada, Thailand, and the United Nations have produced documentation. Other nations have also voiced their concern through their votes in the United Nations and individual and collective statements. Private individuals and organizations are also being heard. Some of these individuals are here today.

Mr. Chairman, [19] it is not as if we were dealing in an area in which civilized standards are vague or international law inadequate. To the contrary, there are two principal international agreements which place restrictions on chemical, biological, and toxin warfare. The first is the 1925 Geneva protocol, one of the oldest treaties on weapons still in force, which prohibits the first use of these types of weapons.

The second treaty is the 1972 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention, which bans the development, production, stockpiling, transfer, and possession of biological and toxin weapons. Both the United States and the Soviet Union are parties to this treaty, as are Afghanistan, Laos, and Vietnam. Not only are both these treaties being violated in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan, but so are universally accepted standards of international law.

Mr. Chairman, the continuing use of chemical and toxin weapons in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan has obvious implications for United States-Soviet relations. It does not mean that we can no longer work with the Soviet Union to build a more stable and secure world, for as the two superpowers we have a special responsibility. It does mean, however, that the policies of our Nation cannot be based on a benign or naive view of the Soviet Union and its intentions. The President has noted the responsibilities we carry and the need for strength and preparedness. With a realistic appraisal of the Soviet goals, and an appreciation that they are not constrained by many of the values we support, we can proceed, with caution and prudence, to help build a world eventually free from chemical, biological, and toxin weapons.

We have all heard the charges that the continuing Soviet defiance of international norms through the use of chemical and toxin weapons proves that arms control cannot work. Further, we are asked: If the Soviets would so blatantly violate two important international treaties, what will keep them from violating other arms control agreements as well?

Mr. Chairman, I believe that Soviet actions lead to a different conclusion—real, equitable, and fully verifiable arms control is an absolute necessity. It is not that arms control is pointless; it is that we have to do a better job of it.

Effective arms control is necessary if we are to reduce the number of destructive weapons in the world and reduce the risk of war. As the President has said, arms control is not an end in itself, but a vital means toward insuring peace and international stability.

Yet if arms control is to work, agreements of this kind must be fully and effectively verified. The Soviet Union will not feel compelled to live by its international agreements if it knows that digression from these agreements will go undetected and unchallenged, and it is not obliged to pay a political cost. To sign agreements which lack tough verification standards would be not only misleading, but also a disservice to all who want real arms control. To refuse to sign equitable agreements with strong verification procedures which are in our own interests would be equally misguided.

The Geneva protocol and the 1972 Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention do not contain verification provisions or adequate measures to address questions of compliance. We are seeking, with others, to remedy these shortcomings and to establish Soviet compliance with both agreements.

In December, the U.N. General Assembly recommended by an overwhelming vote to call on the states that are parties to the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention to hold a special conference as soon as possible to establish effective procedures for compliance with its provisions. In December, the U.N. General Assembly also requested the Secretary-General to establish procedures to investigate promptly possible violations of the 1925 Geneva protocol.[20] We believe that it is important that both resolutions be implemented promptly and we will continue to participate in follow-on actions.

The United States strongly supported the adoption of both resolutions. The Soviet Union and a number of her allies did not. Soviet cooperation is necessary if we are to achieve the goals embodied in the resolutions which are directed at making these two treaties effective. Opportunities are available to the Soviet Union for such cooperation.

We have taken steps to achieve a comprehensive ban on chemical weapons. On February 10 we tabled, in the 40-nation Committee on Disarmament in Geneva, our detailed views on the content of a complete and verifiable chemical weapons convention. In presenting this initiative we reiterated our commitment to the objective of a chemical weapons ban and stressed its urgency.[21]

We propose that any activity to create or maintain a chemical weapons capability should be forbidden. Existing chemical weapons stocks and production and filling facilities should be promptly declared and destroyed over a specified time period.

Our proposal emphasizes the importance of mandatory onsite inspection. An independent, impartial verification system observed by, and responsive to, all parties is essential if we are to be confident that the provisions of the convention are faithfully observed. National technical means alone are insufficient, as they are available only to a few and have only a limited verification usefulness. Systems of "national verification," or self-inspection, are not the answer.

We have proposed that the following be subject to mandatory onsite inspection: declared chemical weapons stocks and the process of their elimination; declared chemical weapons production and filling facilities, and the process of their elimination; declared facilities for permitted production of chemicals which pose particular risks. We have also proposed that the parties be obliged to permit inspections on a challenge basis when questions of compliance arise.

The verification approach we have proposed is tough, but fair and practical. Although no one can guarantee absolute verification, we believe that our security and that of all other countries would be safeguarded. We are insisting on a level of verification which meets that objective and we are prepared to explore seriously any alternative suggestions by other nations to achieve effective verification.

Our views are not fixed but subject to further refinement. The possibility of resuming bilateral negotiations with the Soviet Union remains open. Such negotiations occurred earlier, but lapsed in deadlock in mid-1980, principally over the issue of verification.

We have repeatedly stated that for bilateral negotiations to be fruitful, the Soviet Union would need to demonstrate, rather than simply profess, that it is ready to accept effective provisions to verify compliance with a chemical weapons prohibition. We must also be assured that the Soviet Union is willing to abide by existing agreements.

The focus of negotiations should be on the difficult issues which are impeding progress, especially verification and compliance. Such issues must be resolved if genuine achievements are to take place. Concentrating on the less contentious issues, or even drafting treaty texts, would be a fruitless exercise if an effective verification framework cannot be built.

Mr. Chairman, we hope that our arms control initiatives regarding these weapons will succeed. We do not, however, have any illusions. Agreement will require a major revision of Soviet military strategy, which accepts use of these weapons. We must also overcome longstanding Soviet aversion to effective onsite monitoring. Therefore, conclusion of an acceptable agreement cannot be guaranteed.

This administration remains dedicated to the goal of completely eliminating all chemical, biological, and toxin weapons. Success in this enterprise would enhance not only our security, but that of the whole world.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Prepared Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Burt) Before a Subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee, March 9, 1983 [22]

Implications of a Nuclear Freeze

I particularly welcome the opportunity to testify before this Committee on the subject of a possible freeze on the U.S. nuclear arsenal.

I welcome it for several reasons:

—because this is an issue of such fundamental importance to the security of the United States;

—because of its impact on our allies;

---

[22] Source: Department of State files; also printed in Current Policy No. 470, March 9, 1983, Bureau of Public Affairs, Department of State. Burt testified before the Subcommittee on Procurement and Military Nuclear Systems. The hearings will not be published until the 98th Congress has adjourned. All ellipses are in the source text.

—and, ultimately, because of its importance to the maintenance of peace.

The prevention of nuclear war is the highest priority of this administration. It must be the highest priority of any administration in the nuclear age. All of us know what nuclear war would mean for our country and the world. As the President himself has repeatedly said, in such a war, there can be no winners.

No one has a monopoly on the desire to avoid a nuclear catastrophe.

—We recognize that nuclear freeze proposals [23] issue from a profound concern about the danger of nuclear war; we fully share that concern.

—We also know that these proposals are supported by many who are deeply committed to rapid and significant progress in arms control. We, too, share that commitment.

The debate here is not over ends; it is about means. It is not a debate between those with good and those with malevolent intentions. The issue is how to translate the good intentions of those who desire effective arms control into actions which will achieve that end.

I believe the proposals for a freeze on the U.S. nuclear arsenal—however well intentioned they are and however attractive they may seem—would not achieve their stated purpose. On the contrary, I am convinced that they would diminish our national security and ultimately increase, not reduce, the danger of war.

—A freeze would encourage, rather than discourage, threatening Soviet behavior.

—It would hinder, rather than help, our efforts to achieve effective arms control.

—And it would weaken, rather than strengthen, the Atlantic Alliance which is the cornerstone of our own security.

Implications for Our Relations With the Soviet Union

The effective management of our relations with the Soviet Union is essential to the preservation of peace and stability in the world. Toward that end, our policy toward the Soviet Union must be based on consistency, resolve and national and allied unity. We cannot successfully manage this vital relationship—we cannot moderate Soviet international conduct — on the basis of gestures which would only be interpreted as signs of weakness and division.

Unilateral U.S. restraint during the 1970's, which was tantamount to a freeze on our part, did not produce Soviet restraint. On the contrary, the Soviet Union implemented expansionist policies in far regions of the world and carried out the most intensive conventional and nuclear military buildup in peacetime history.

The changes in the military balance—or as the Soviets would say, the correlation of forces—which resulted from our respective policies during the 1970's mean that even a mutual freeze under present circumstances would only legitimize existing Soviet nuclear advantage, with uncertain and potentially dangerous political and military consequences.

The Soviet Union has itself frequently advanced proposals for freezing forces, so as to conserve the military advantages it has acquired and avoid having to undertake significant reductions in arms control negotiations.

A freeze would undermine the relative capability of our nuclear deterrent vis-à-vis the Soviet Union and, as a result, the credibility of our strategy of deterrence, which has successfully preserved the peace for over three decades. Moreover, as you know, it would not be verifiable.

The Soviet leadership's assessment of our resolve is every bit as important to the effectiveness of deterrence as is the Soviet calculation of our military capability. But even a nonbinding freeze resolution would raise the most fundamental questions about our will to deter aggression and, if necessary, repel it with force.

[23] The Senate nuclear freeze proposal was introduced on January 26, 1983, as Senate Joint Resolution 2 by Senators Kennedy and Hatfield. The principal House nuclear freeze proposal was introduced as House Joint Resolution 13 on January 3, 1983, by Congressman Zablocki.

Implications for Arms Control

Many proponents of a freeze maintain that it could be an effective first step toward arms control.

In fact, I fear that it would have just the opposite effect.

As you know, we are engaged in a variety of arms control endeavors.

—In START, we are seeking deep cuts in the strategic nuclear weapons whose existence inspires such justified concern, and we are focusing our efforts on the most destabilizing systems, namely land-based ICBM's.

—In INF, we have proposed the elimination of an entire class of U.S. and Soviet nuclear weapons—an unprecedented offer in the history of nuclear arms control. The President has at the same time made clear that this is not a take-it-or-leave-it offer. Ambassador Nitze has been authorized to explore any possible solutions which would take four fundamental principles into account:

—Any agreement must provide for equal levels between the United States and the Soviet Union;

—As a corollary, no agreement should include the independent national deterrents of France and Great Britain;

—An agreement should not have the effect of transferring the threat from Europe to Asia; —And any agreement must provide for effective verification.

These are not only eminently fair and reasonable conditions. They are absolutely vital to serious and effective arms control. It remains for the Soviet Union to decide whether it will negotiate on the basis of them.

We are also seeking significant reductions of military manpower in Europe in the MBFR negotiations, as well as a total verifiable ban of chemical weapons, which we are pursuing in the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva.

In all of these negotiations we are pursuing the same goal: arms control agreements which will enhance peace and stability not by just placing a ceiling on the arms race, but by actually producing verifiable, militarily significant reductions in armaments.

The principal obstacle to progress in all these arms control endeavors so far has been Soviet reluctance to agree to significant reductions and/or to a verification regime which would guarantee compliance.

Whether the Soviet Union will change its position in this regard is difficult to predict. But it is certain that it will not if it has no incentive to do so. A freeze would in effect reward the Soviet Union for its arms buildup.

The Soviets have agreed to real arms control only when it has been in their interest to do so. You will recall the major debate over the ABM system. Only when the Congress—by one vote—authorized the government to proceed with the ABM did the Soviet Union have the incentive to enter into negotiations on and eventually agree to the ABM Treaty.

Prior to NATO's 1979 dual-track INF decision [24] the Soviet Union was unwilling to consider control on the SS-20 missiles. It was only after that decision was taken, and after the Soviets were finally convinced, on the basis of U.S. and allied preparations, that we were fully committed to implementing the 1979 decision did they agree to negotiations.

We must ask ourselves whether the Soviet Union would be in Geneva today negotiating over these systems if we had not moved ahead with preparations for counter-deployments of U.S. longer-range INF missiles. Similarly, the prospect of U.S. strategic modernization continues to be a vital element in ensuring serious START negotiations.

With your permission I would like briefly to read to you the views of Ambassadors Nitze and Rowny on the freeze question:

—Ambassador Nitze reports that, " . . . The passage (of a freeze resolution) would seriously undermine our ability to negotiate an equitable agreement. . . . Continuation of NATO preparations for deployment of U.S. longer-range INF missiles in Europe and the prospect of that deployment are the strongest incentives the Soviets have to negotiate seriously. . . . Were the development and deployment of U.S. longer-range INF missiles to be deferred, we would have virtually no bargaining leverage with the Soviets. They would have every reason to draw out the negotiations indefinitely without result," Ambassador Nitze concludes.

Ambassador Rowny, for his part, advises that "negotiations on reducing strategic arms would be made immensely more difficult, if not impossible, by passage of a freeze resolution. . . . The Soviets would have no incentive to negotiate. . . ."

We should not delude ourselves. A mutual freeze would be every bit as difficult to negotiate as arms reductions themselves—indeed, such a complete ban on production, development and deployment of new systems could prove even more complicated than our current complex and difficult arms talks.

Moreover, a freeze would be a step backwards. In START, both sides have accepted the concept of reductions; in INF the Soviets have moved away from rigid insistence on the maintenance of current SS-20 force levels. Why should we throw away the opportunity to achieve real reductions in the talks which are now under way in exchange for the uncertain and potentially dangerous alternative of a freeze?

Implications for Relations With Our Allies

The U.S. strategic deterrent is fundamental to the effectiveness—even the survival—of NATO.

—Militarily, our nuclear forces are the capstone of NATO's deterrent and the linchpin of our strategy of flexible response. They are the ultimate link between European security and our own, as the only forces which ultimately can deter the Soviets from using, or threatening to use, their own nuclear potential or massive conventional forces.

—Politically and psychologically, our strategic deterrent and the presence of U.S. troops in Europe symbolize our commitment to the defense of Europe and our conviction that the security of Western Europe and our own security are indeed indivisible.

A freeze would undermine our capacity to defend Europe, and it would inspire doubts among European leaders and publics about our resolve to do so. As such, it would have the most deleterious effect on the underpinnings of the alliance.

It is significant that no major allied government, all of which support arms control in principle but are deeply concerned about Soviet nuclear modernization and the current nuclear balance, has spoken out in favor of a freeze. Indeed, they have all repeatedly rejected Europe-wide freeze proposals offered by the Soviet Union. By destroying the deployment track of the NATO two-track decision, a freeze would cut the ground out from under these European leaders who have steadfastly held to implementation of that decision.

In short, a freeze resolution would call into question the will and ability of the United States to exercise its leadership in a manner which protects the interests of all.

Conclusion

To sum up, I believe that the consequences of a freeze resolution would be the opposite of those its proponents hope to achieve.

—It would encourage irresponsible, rather than restrained, Soviet conduct.

—It would threaten stability by preventing reestablishment of the strategic balance, rather than strengthening that balance.

—It would cripple, rather than advance, our arms control initiatives.

—It would weaken, not strengthen, the Atlantic alliance upon which our own security so heavily depends.

—It would heighten the risk of war, rather than strengthen the peace.

I ask you to bear these concerns in mind in the course of your deliberations. We share with you the same objectives of preventing war and securing the peace, and the same commitment to effective arms control as an essential means to that end. We believe that the President's program—the most comprehensive arms control program ever set out by any American administration—is the best way of fully achieving this objective.

Address by President Reagan Before the World Affairs Council, Los Angeles, March 31, 1983 [25]

"We've Launched the Most Comprehensive Program of Arms Control Initiatives Ever Taken"

Last week, I spoke to the American people about our plans for safeguarding this nation's security and that of our allies.[26] And I announced a long-term effort in scientific research to counter some day the menace of offensive nuclear missiles. What I have proposed is that nations should turn their best energies to moving away from the nuclear nightmare. We must not resign ourselves to a future in which security on both sides depends on threatening the lives of millions of innocent men, women, and children.

And today, I would like to discuss another vital aspect of our national security: our efforts to limit and reduce the danger of modern weaponry.

We live in a world in which total war would mean catastrophe. We also live in a world that's torn by a great moral struggle between democracy and its enemies, between the spirit of freedom and those who fear freedom.

In the last 15 years or more, the Soviet Union has engaged in a relentless military buildup, overtaking and surpassing the United States in major categories of military power, acquiring what can only be considered an offensive military capability. All the moral values, which this country cherishes, freedom, democracy, the right of peoples and nations to determine their own destiny, to speak and write, to live and worship as they choose, all these basic rights are fundamentally challenged by a powerful adversary which does not wish these values to survive.

This is our dilemma, and it's a profound one. We must both defend freedom and preserve the peace. We must stand true to our principles and our friends while preventing a holocaust.

The Western commitment to peace through strength has given Europe its longest period of peace in a century. We cannot conduct ourselves as if the special danger of nuclear weapons did not exist. But we must not allow ourselves to be paralyzed by the problem, to abdicate our moral duty. This is the challenge that history has left us.

We of the 20th century who so pride ourselves on mastering even the forces of nature—except last week when the Queen was here [27]—(Laughter)—we are forced to wrestle with one of the most complex moral challenges ever faced by any generation. Now, my views about the Soviet Union are well known. Although, sometimes I don't recognize them when they're played back to me. (Laughter) And our program for maintaining, strengthening, and modernizing our national defense has been clearly stated.

Today, let me tell you something of what we are doing to reduce the danger of nuclear war. Since the end of World War II, the United States has been the leader in the international effort to negotiate nuclear arms limitations. In 1946, when the United States was the only country in the world possessing these awesome weapons, we did not blackmail others with threats to use them, nor did we use our enormous power to conquer territory, to advance our position, or to seek domination.

Doesn't our record alone refute the charge that we seek superiority, that we represent a threat to peace. We proposed the Baruch Plan for international control of all nuclear weapons and nuclear energy, for everything nuclear to be turned over to an international agency. And this was rejected by the Soviet Union. Several years later, in 1955, President Eisenhower presented his "open skies" proposal that the United States and the Soviet Union would exchange blueprints of military establishments and permit aerial reconnaissance to ensure against the danger of surprise attack. This, too, was rejected by the Soviet Union.

Now, since then, some progress has been made, largely at American initiative. The 1963 Limited Test Ban Treaty prohibited nuclear testing in the atmosphere, in outer space, or under water. The creation of the "hot line" in 1963, upgraded in 1971, provides direct communication between Washington and Moscow to avoid miscalculation during a crisis. The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty of 1968 sought to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. In 1971, we reached an agreement on special communication procedures to safeguard against accidental or unauthorized use of nuclear weapons, and on a seabed arms control treaty, which prohibits the placing of nuclear weapons on the seabed of the ocean floor. The Strategic Arms Limitation Agreements of 1972 imposed limits on anti-ballistic missile systems and on numbers of strategic, offensive missiles. And the 1972 Biological Warfare Convention bans—or was supposed to ban—the development and production and stockpiling of biological and toxin weapons. [28]

But while many agreements have been reached, we've also suffered many disappointments. The American people had hoped, by these measures to reduce tensions and start to build a constructive relationship with the Soviet Union.

Instead, we have seen Soviet military arsenals continue to grow in virtually every significant category. We have seen the Soviet Union project its power around the globe. We have seen Soviet resistance to significant reductions and measures of effective verification, especially the latter. And, I'm sorry to say, there have been increasingly serious grounds for questioning their compliance with the arms control agreements that have already been signed and that we've both pledged to uphold. I may have more to say on this in the near future.

Coming into office, I made two promises to the American people about peace and security: I promised to restore our neglected defenses, in order to strengthen and preserve the peace, and I promised to pursue reliable agreements to reduce nuclear weapons. Both these promises are being kept.

Today, not only the peace but also the chances for real arms control depend on restoring the military balance. We know that the ideology of the Soviet leaders does not permit them to leave any Western weakness unprobed, any vacuum of power unfilled. It would seem that to them negotiation is only another form of struggle. Yet, I believe the Soviets can be persuaded to reduce their arsenals—but only if they see it's absolutely necessary. Only if they recognize the West's determination to modernize its own military forces will they see an incentive to negotiate a verifiable agreement establishing equal, lower levels. And, very simply, that is one of the main reasons why we must rebuild our defensive strength.

All of our strategic force modernization has been approved by the Congress except for the land-based leg of the Triad. We expect to get congressional approval on this final program later this spring. A strategic forces modernization program depends on a national bipartisan consensus. Over the last decade, four successive administrations have made proposals for arms control and modernization that have become embroiled in political controversy. No one gained from this divisiveness; all of us are going to have to take a fresh look at our previous positions. I pledge to you my participation in such a fresh look and my determination to assist in forging a renewed bipartisan consensus.

My other national security priority on assuming office was to thoroughly re-examine the entire arms control agenda. Since then, in coordination with our allies, we've launched the most comprehensive program of arms control initiatives ever undertaken. Never before in history has a nation engaged in so many major simultaneous efforts to limit and reduce the instruments of war. Last month in Geneva, the Vice President committed the United States to negotiate a total and verifiable ban on chemical weapons. Such inhumane weapons, as well as toxin weapons, are being used in violation of international law in Afghanistan, in Laos, and Kampuchea.

[28] The treaties referred to in this paragraph are cited as follows: 14 UST 1313 (Test Ban); 14 UST 825 and 22 UST 1598 (Hot Line); 21 UST 483 (Non-Proliferation); 22 UST 1590 (Accidents); 23 UST 701 (Seabed); 23 UST 3435 and 23 UST 3462 (SALT I); and 26 UST 583 (Biological Weapons).

Together with our allies, we've offered a comprehensive new proposal for mutual and balanced reduction of conventional forces in Europe. [29]

We have recently proposed to the Soviet Union a series of further measures to reduce the risk of war from accident or miscalculation. [30] And we are considering significant new measures resulting in part from consultations with several distinguished Senators.

We've joined our allies in proposing a conference on disarmament in Europe. On the basis of a balanced outcome of the Madrid meeting, [31] such a conference will discuss new ways to enhance European stability and security.

We have proposed to the Soviet Union improving the verification provisions of two agreements to limit underground nuclear testing, but, so far, the response has been negative. We will continue to try.

And, most importantly, we have made far-reaching proposals, which I will discuss further in a moment, for deep reductions in strategic weapons and for elimination of an entire class of intermediate-range weapons.

I am determined to achieve real arms control—reliable agreements that will stand the test of time, not cosmetic agreements that raise expectations only to have hopes cruelly dashed.

In all these negotations certain basic principles guide our policy: First, our efforts to control arms should seek reductions on both sides—significant reductions. Second, we insist that arms control agreements be equal and balanced. Third, arms control agreements must be effectively verifiable. We cannot gamble with the safety of our people and the people of the world. Fourth, we recognize that arms control is not an end in itself but a vital part of a broad policy designed to strengthen peace and stability. It's with these firm principles in mind that this administration has approached negotiations on the most powerful weapons in the American and Soviet arsenals—strategic nuclear weapons.

In June of 1982, American and Soviet negotiators convened in Geneva to begin the strategic arms reduction talks, what we call START. We've sought to work out an agreement reducing the levels of strategic weapons on both sides. I proposed reducing the number of ballistic missiles by one-half and the number of warheads by one-third. No more than half the remaining warheads could be on land-based missiles. This would leave both sides with greater security at equal and lower levels of forces.

Not only would this reduce numbers—it would also put specific limits on precisely those types of nuclear weapons that pose the most danger.

The Soviets have made a counter proposal. We've raised a number of serious concerns about it. But—and this is important—they have accepted the concept of reductions. Now, I expect this is because of the firm resolve that we have demonstrated. In the current round of negotiations, we have presented them with the basic elements of a treaty for comprehensive reductions in strategic arsenals. The United States also has, in START, recently proposed a draft agreement on a number of significant measures to build confidence and reduce the risks of conflict. This negotiation is proceeding under the able leadership of Ambassador Edward Rowny on our side—Edward Rowny, I should say, on our side.

We're also negotiating in Geneva to eliminate an entire class of new weapons from the face of the Earth. Since the end of the mid-1970's, the Soviet Union has been deploying an intermediate range nuclear missile, the SS-20, at a rate of one a week. There are now 351 of these missiles, each with three highly accurate warheads capable of destroying cities and military bases in Western Europe, Asia, and the Middle East.

NATO has no comparable weapon; nor did NATO in any way provoke this new, unprecedented escalation. In fact, while the Soviets were deploying their SS-20's, we were taking a thousand nuclear warheads from shorter range weapons out of Europe.

This major shift in the European military balance, prompted our West European allies themselves to propose that NATO find a means of righting the balance. And in December of 1979, they announced a collective two-track decision.

First, to deploy in Western Europe 572 land-based cruise missiles and Pershing II ballistic missiles, capable of reaching the Soviet Union. The purpose, to offset and deter the Soviet SS-20's. The first of these NATO weapons are scheduled for deployment by the end of this year.

Second, to seek negotiations with the Soviet Union for the mutual reduction of these intermediate-range missiles.

In November of 1981, the United States, in concert with our allies, made a sweeping new proposal: NATO would cancel its own deployment if the Soviets eliminated theirs. The Soviet Union refused and set out to intensify public pressures in the West to block the NATO deployment, which has not even started. Meanwhile, the Soviet weapons continue to grow in number.

Our proposal was not made on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. We are willing to consider any Soviet proposal that meets these standards of fairness:

An agreement must establish equal numbers for both Soviet and American intermediate-range nuclear forces.

Other countries' nuclear forces, such as the British and French, are independent and are not part of the bilateral U.S.-Soviet negotiations. They are, in fact, strategic weapons and the Soviet strategic arsenal more than compensates for them.

Next, an agreement must not shift the threat from Europe to Asia. Given the range in mobility of the SS-20's, meaningful limits on these and comparable American systems must be global.

An agreement must be effectively verifiable.

And an agreement must not undermine NATO's ability to defend itself with conventional forces.

We've been consulting closely with our Atlantic allies and they strongly endorse these principles.

Earlier this week, I authorized our negotiator in Geneva, Ambassador Paul Nitze, to inform the Soviet delegation of a new American proposal which has the full support of our allies.

We are prepared to negotiate an interim agreement to reduce our planned deployment if the Soviet Union will reduce their corresponding warheads to an equal level. This would include all U.S. and Soviet weapons of this class, wherever they're located. Our offer of zero on both sides will, of course, remain on the table as our ultimate goal. At the same time, we remain open—as we have been from the very outset—to serious counterproposals. The Soviet negotiators have now returned to Moscow where we hope our new proposal will receive careful consideration during the recess. Ambassador Nitze has proposed and the Soviets have agreed that negotiations resume in mid-May, several weeks earlier than scheduled.

I am sorry that the Soviet Union, so far, has not been willing to accept the complete elimination of these systems on both sides. The question I now put to the Soviet Government is: If not elimination, to what equal level are you willing to reduce? The new proposal is designed to promote early and genuine progress at Geneva. For arms control to be truly complete and world security strengthened, however, we must also increase our efforts to halt the spread of nuclear arms. Every country that values a peaceful world order must play its part.

Our Allies, as important nuclear exporters, also have a very important responsibility to prevent the spread of nuclear arms. To advance this goal, we should all adopt comprehensive safeguards as a condition for nuclear supply commitments that we make in the future. In the days ahead, I will be talking to other world leaders about the need for urgent movement on this and other measures against nuclear proliferation.

Now, that is the arms control agenda we have been pursuing. Our proposals are fair. They are far-reaching and comprehensive. But we still have a long way to go. We Americans are sometimes an impatient people. I guess it is a symptom of our traditional optimism, energy, and spirit. Often, this is a source of strength. In a negotiation, however, impatience can be a real handicap. Any of you who have been involved in labor-management negotiations or any kind of bargaining know that patience strengthens your bargaining position. If one side seems too eager or desperate, the other side has no reason to offer a compromise and every reason to hold back, expecting that the more eager side will cave in first.

Well, this is a basic fact of life we cannot afford to lose sight of when dealing with the Soviet Union. Generosity in negotiation has never been a trademark of theirs. It runs counter to the basic militancy of Marxist-Leninist ideology. So it is vital that we show patience, determination, and above all, national unity. If we appear to be divided, if the Soviets suspect that domestic, political pressure will undercut our position, they will dig in their heels. And that can only delay an agreement, and may destroy all hope for an agreement.

That is why I have been concerned about the nuclear freeze proposals, one of which is being considered at this time by the House of Representatives.[32] Most of those who support the freeze, I am sure, are well-intentioned, concerned about the arms race and the danger of nuclear war. No one shares their concern more than I do. But however well-intentioned they are, these freeze proposals would do more harm than good. They may seem to offer a simple solution. But there are no simple solutions to complex problems. As H. L. Mencken once wryly remarked, he said, "For every problem, there's one solution which is simple, neat, and wrong." (Laughter)

The freeze concept is dangerous for many reasons. It would preserve today's high, unequal, and unstable levels of nuclear forces, and, by so doing, reduce Soviet incentives to negotiate for real reductions.

It would pull the rug out from under our negotiators in Geneva, as they have testified. After all, why should the Soviets negotiate if they've already achieved a freeze in a position of advantage to them?

Also, some think a freeze would be easy to agree on, but it raises enormously complicated problems of what is to be frozen, how it is to be achieved and, most of all, verified. Attempting to negotiate these critical details would only divert us from the goal of negotiating reductions for who knows how long.

The freeze proposal would also make a lot more sense if a similar movement against nuclear weapons were putting similar pressures on Soviet leaders in Moscow. As former Secretary of Defense Harold Brown has pointed out—the effect of the freeze "is to put pressure on the United States, but not on the Soviet Union."

Finally, the freeze would reward the Soviets for their 15-year buildup while locking us into our existing equipment, which in many cases is obsolete and badly in need of modernization. Three-quarters of Soviet strategic warheads are on delivery systems 5 years old or less. Three-quarters of the American strategic warheads are on delivery systems 15 years old or older. The time comes when everything wears out. The trouble is, it comes a lot sooner for us than for them. And, under a freeze, we couldn't do anything about it.

Our B–52 bombers are older than many of the pilots who fly them. If they were automobiles, they'd qualify as antiques. A freeze could lock us into obsolescence. It's asking too much to expect our service men and women to risk their lives in obsolete equipment. The 2 million patriotic Americans in the armed services deserve the best and most modern equipment to protect them and us.

I'm sure that every President has dreamt of leaving the world a safer place than he found it. I pledge to you, my goal—and I consider it a sacred trust—will be to make progress toward arms reductions in every one of the several negotiations now underway.

I call on all Americans of both parties and all branches of government to join in this effort. We must not let our disagreements or partisan politics keep us from strengthening the peace and reducing armaments.

I pledge to our allies and friends in Europe and Asia—we will continue to consult with you closely. We're conscious of our responsibility when we negotiate with our adversaries on conditions of—or issues of concern to you and your safety and well-being.

To the leaders and people of the Soviet Union, I say, join us in the path to a more peaceful, secure world. Let us—(Applause)—Let us vie in the realm of ideas, on the field of peaceful competition. Let history record that we tested our theories through human experience, not that we destroyed ourselves in the name of vindicating our way of life. And let us practice restraint in our international conduct, so that the present climate of mistrust can some day give way to mutual confidence and a secure peace.

What better time to rededicate ourselves to this undertaking than in the Easter season, when millions of the world's people pay homage to the One who taught us peace on earth, good will toward men?

This is the goal, my fellow Americans, of all the democratic nations—a goal that requires firmness, patience and understanding. If the Soviet Union responds in the same spirit, we're ready. And we can pass on to our posterity the gift of peace—that and freedom are the greatest gifts that one generation can bequeath to another.

Thank you. And God bless you.

Transcript of a White House Press Briefing, April 21, 1983 (Extract) [33]

Creation of Interagency Group To Analyze Soviet Compliance With Arms Control Treaties

. . . . . .

[MR. SPEAKES.] There are a couple of stories that are pending in the newspapers this morning. One is, I think, the New York Times has it and at least AP and a couple of networks have had it about a new group that is looking into compliance and verification issues involving the Soviet Union. Here's our position on it. We're making a very serious approach, as we've said many, many times, on the question of arms control. One of the central questions involved in arms control is the compliance and verification issues. And, I think, everyone involved in the arms control talks, from our teams in Europe that are having discussions with Soviets, to the appropriate agencies within the government, agrees that this is a central and important issue.

The President, several months ago, in fact before the first of the year, [34] directed that there be a careful analysis of compliance and verification procedures, as we proceed into the complexities of the arms control talks this year.

Among that was an analysis of past Soviet practices. Our objective is to develop better treaties and better methods of verification and compliance. We think it is an essential ingredient of arms control that we have adequate verification. We think both sides, the United States and the Soviets, do have that interest at stake.

One of the reasons that the SALT II Treaty was not ratified by Congress was because of some questions about compliance. We recognize that this is a complex and technical subject that requires a careful and deliberate analysis.

So, at the President's direction, he has established an interagency group which is coordinated by NSC but includes all the appropriate agencies of the government. And they are addressing all the issues and treaties passed and those that are currently under discussion, that include the compliance and verification procedures.

So, this is—previously, it had been done each individual test ban treaty or chemical biological warfare treaty had been handled by a separate group. This is a coordinating group that was actually directed by the [33] Source: Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The briefing, which was conducted by Larry Speakes, Deputy Press Secretary to the President, began at 9:20 a.m.

[34] In a second White House press briefing on April 21, 1983, which began at 12:38 p.m., Speakes said that it was in November 1982 that the President directed that the group be formed. Although the group was formed shortly after that time, it did not meet for the first time until early in April.

President last year. And it is now in operation.

Q. Did the past studies, whether they were done individually or otherwise, find violations by the Soviets?

MR. SPEAKES. There have certainly been some questionable practices but we have not said publicly nor am I prepared to say publicly that there have been violations.

Q. Well—

MR. SPEAKES. But the point is that these are very complex issues. The treaties are complex. The methods of verification are complex. So, what we're now doing is simply giving the arms negotiation question some additional input in a serious fashion.

Q. That's not the way it's being interpreted. It's being interpreted as nailing the Soviets and saying, "you're violating" and—

MR. SPEAKES. Well—

Q. —building up a conservative—

MR. SPEAKES. I can understand that there is a misinterpretation, but when the President, as much as 6 or 8 months ago, saw the need for this and directed that there be an overall approach to it as a part of our arms reduction procedure at Geneva and elsewhere.

Q. Does that mean we will stop abiding by SALT II terms?

MR. SPEAKES. No.

Q. But your statements—

Q. Larry, do you—

MR. SPEAKES. Wait, wait. It has nothing to do with that. It is simply a method to look at and analyze present treaties and present Soviet behavior.

Q. But you're not going as far as the President's remarks in Los Angeles when he said there were "some very serious questions about Soviet compliance and I will have"—

MR. SPEAKES. There—

Q. —"I may have something to say about it soon." Does that still stand?

MR. SPEAKES. Sure.

Q. Larry, is Judge Clark heading up this study?

MR. SPEAKES. Well, it's under the NSC and Judge Clark is the head of the NSC, but it's basically—NSC is always on national security matters, is the White House coordinating agency, and all agencies are involved.

Q. Does that mean yes?

Q. So how do you—

MR. SPEAKES. Pardon?

Q. Does that mean yes?

MR. SPEAKES. Well, that's customary.

Q. Will he talk about compliance Wednesday night? [35]

Q. But I mean, yes, he is heading it up?

MR. SPEAKES. Well, I think it's difficult to say that. NSC is always the coordinating agency as far as the President is concerned. And Judge Clark is the head of the NSC and his staff bring in these various groups, but I wouldn't—

Q. When would you expect this study would end and the President might decide to make a speech about it?

MR. SPEAKES. Ralph, I don't have a timetable. We all recognize that it's very complex and it's going to require a lot of analysis, but the approach is to let us do a better job as we proceed into the arms control talks, and I think it will benefit all of us.

Q. It sounds—

Q. —Wednesday night—

Q. Excuse me. One follow-up.

MR. SPEAKES. Let's go one at a time. We've got all day here, now.

Q. One follow-up.

MR. SPEAKES. Just don't get excited.

Q. It sounds to me—and I may be misinterpreting that—that you're backing away from what the President said in Los Angeles.

MR. SPEAKES. No.

[35] See document 623.

Q. Well, you haven't gone anywhere near as far as his statement.

MR. SPEAKES. Well, no, I'm not backing away. He said what he said. I say what I said. I didn't even address what he said. What I'm saying is that we're looking very closely.

Q. Some of the people in the arms control community claim that the NSC is at work on a speech on Soviet treaty violations. Is that correct?

MR. SPEAKES. No, not correct. There are always drafts of speeches and so forth that float around. There are always a lot of people that have done a lot of forward thinking, but when the President is ready to speak out on it he will.

Q. Larry, are we going to be safe assuming the President will not speak out until such time as this complex study is completed?

MR. SPEAKES. He'll speak out when he gets ready.

Q. Wednesday night, maybe?

MR. SPEAKES. No. He said Central America.

Q. Larry, why did he—

Q. He won't discuss compliance then?

MR. SPEAKES. I wouldn't think so.

Q. Why did he drop such a very large hint—

Q. —the ANPA—

Q. —that something was going to be forthcoming from him?

MR. SPEAKES. It is.

Q. Well, yes, but it's such an unfocused thing that you can't tell us when or when he makes a decision?

MR. SPEAKES. He didn't say when either.

Q. Yes, I know, but he usually does not tip his hand like that.

MR. SPEAKES. He said what he said, so I mean I can't read anything into that except he said, "I may have something to say on it later," and he certainly may.

Q. Will it be before May 17?

MR. SPEAKES. Certainly he may.

Q. —will have something—

Q. Would you say there's been no change in emphasis? I mean it seems like the President's—

MR. SPEAKES. You missed what I said.

Q. —previous discussions in here—

MR. SPEAKES. You missed what I said. What I said was that his previous—these studies were previously done by individual groups on individual treaties. Now we have coordination.

Q. Well, no, you said that the focus here earlier is to help negotiators in negotiating better compliance and verification procedures. And in both the President's speech, and it seems to me in previous discussions in here, we seem to focus more on the issue of violations.

MR. SPEAKES. Well, it's both. I mean, it's all-encompassing. I don't see how you can separate the two. If you're looking for better ways to develop a treaty so that it will be, number one, ratified by the Congress, and, number two, will stand the test of time, then you look for a—

Q. Well, these treaties have stood the test of time. We haven't had a nuclear war in 35 years.

Q. About 35 years.

MR. SPEAKES. But . . . has the arms buildup stopped?

Q. Not on either side.

MR. SPEAKES. Well, I know.

Q. Well, that isn't the point. It never really—

MR. SPEAKES. The point is that if you can have some agreement—

Q. Have we violated the treaty?

MR. SPEAKES. —on verification—Not to my knowledge, no.

Q. Larry, you linked verification and compliance together and you said that the reason the SALT II had problems in Congress was problems of verification as well as compliance. Is the administration growing more confident in its ability to verify potential violations of things like SALT II?

MR. SPEAKES. This is part of it.

Q. Was that a yes?

MR. SPEAKES. Yes, sure, we've grown more confident in it.

Q. And so then it shifts to the question of compliance then?

MR. SPEAKES. What you do is you come down to the business of negotiating a treaty that spells out these means and methods and spells out the procedures. What we're dealing with are treaties that are very complex, the wording is complex. It is difficult to—for both sides to agree on the meeting and the verification procedures that are allowed under the treaties are difficult. So what we look at is procedures that will be agreeable as we proceed in the discussions.

Q. So, Larry, there will not be any treaty until this study is finished.

MR. SPEAKES. No. No, I think you're fine tuning this much, much further than it merits.

Q. Well, we think it's because the conservatives want to create an atmosphere, or at least some people think it is, create an atmosphere where you won't have arms control.

MR. SPEAKES. Well . . . I—

Q. And if you raise the—

MR. SPEAKES. —I understand—

Q. —tensions with the Soviet Union and start accusing them of everything, how can you go into an agreement with them?

MR. SPEAKES. I understand your desire to write that angle; but I cannot help you on it. I have stated the official position of the United States Government, the President's thinking on it, that originated many months ago. And if you want to take what you think—

Q. You know, you started arms control talks, reduction talks, 2 years ago. How come this is suddenly an issue now?

MR. SPEAKES. It has not suddenly become an issue. It has been an issue on the mind of the President, now, for several months. So—

MR. ALLIN. The issue has been studied . . . in context of the INF interagency group and in context of the START interagency group. This is a comprehensive review—

Q. Well, what are the conclusions?

MR. ALLIN. Excuse me. This is a comprehensive review of all treaties and agreements that have been negotiated in the past dealing with verification and compliance issues and dealing with the verification and compliance issues that apply to those treaties which we are now negotiating, including MBFR, the three different sets of negotiations that are on-going.

Now, the conclusions and the reports and the work of the other committees, some of those are still going on within the context of the negotiating procedures. And they will be incorporated, obviously, within this study as well.

Q. Larry—

MR. SPEAKES. Okay. Second subject.

Q. When was this set in motion again?

MR. SPEAKES. Six or eight months ago, before the first of the year.

Q. Did the President direct this study being conducted, because he does not trust the Russians?

MR. SPEAKES. No.

Q. He trusts them?

Q. He does trust the Russians? (Laughter)

MR. SPEAKES. No. That is not why he directed the study.

Q. Larry, hasn't he presupposed the thrust of this report? He has called the Russians dishonest, cheaters, the focus of evil.

MR. SPEAKES. Let me say something right here. I come in here and tell you exactly what the President is thinking. I tell you the full story on why this was done. I tell you exactly what it is. Yet, you are determined to write something else.

Q. No. We are not determined. We just want to find out the other aspects.

MR. SPEAKES. And I have told you.

Q. You should not presuppose anything either.

MR. SPEAKES. I know. But your statements fly into the face—it is interesting that, very often, reporters will take what some mid-level guy says on background and go with it in the face of what an official spokesman walks out here and says—"Look; this is it."

Q. You are confirming a story in the New York Times which has that whole aspect very high in the story.

MR. SPEAKES. I understand.

Q. Okay. That is why the questions are legitimate.

MR. SPEAKES. But if it is wrong, it is wrong.

Fiscal Year 1984 Arms Control Impact Statements, Submitted by the Reagan Administration to the Congress, April 1983 (Extracts) [36]

Potential Impact of Conventional, Chemical, and Nuclear Defense Programs on Arms Control Policy and Negotiations

The increasing vulnerability of the Minuteman force, the necessity to maintain the deterrent contribution of the ICBM leg of the Triad, the political and military implications of an asymmetry in ICBM capabilities (including prompt, hard-target-kill capabilities) favoring the Soviet Union, and the ongoing and projected overall buildup of Soviet strategic forces have led to the decisions to deploy the Peacekeeper (MX) missile and to continue upgrading the Minuteman force. The decision to deploy the Peacekeeper (MX) reflects a judgment that the paramount necessities are to maintain the ICBM leg of the Triad's unique contribution to credible deterrence and to deny the Soviets any political or military advantages that may result from a major asymmetry in relative ICBM capabilities. The greater capability of the Peacekeeper (MX) will maintain the U.S. ICBM force's retaliatory capabilities, further redressing the perception, and the reality, of increased Soviet advantages in certain force characteristics. Improved prompt hard-target-kill capabilities also could permit the US to attain an effective capability against Soviet military and command/control targets which have been increasingly hardened.

There are political as well as military reasons to retain U.S. hard-target-kill capabilities. Failure to deploy Peacekeeper (MX) could lead to perceptions of Soviet advantage with the following implications: (1) greater Soviet freedom of action in the employment of conventional forces; (2) greater Soviet latitude in the implicit utilization of nuclear strength for political coercion; (3) the development of new perceptions of relative U.S. and Soviet strength among third countries that could have a wide impact on US foreign policy; and (4) an adverse affect on Allied willingness to deploy GLCM and Pershing II nuclear weapons in Europe.

Deployment of the Peacekeeper (MX) and modifications to the Minuteman would be consistent with the terms of SALT I and II. These agreements would allow modifications of existing weapon systems within specific constraints, and

The extracts printed here are sections in the statements entitled "Summary and Overall Arms Control Assessment" of specific U.S. defense programs. A digest of the 372-page compilation of the statements prepared by the Congressional Research Service appears on pp. xi–xxv.

Arms Control Impact Statements are required under the terms of 22 U.S.C. 2576, as amended. The fiscal year 1984 statements, which were transmitted to Congress accompanied by a letter of submittal dated January 31, 1983, from the Acting Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, James L. George, to Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill and President of the Senate George Bush, mark the eighth year in which they have been submitted by the President to Congress.

the SALT II agreement would permit deployment of one new type ICBM.

When fully deployed, the Peacekeeper (MX) will bolster deterrence by eroding Soviet confidence in their ability to conduct successfully strategic operations against the United States. By helping to rectify the current imbalance, deployment of the Peacekeeper (MX) will give the Soviets a powerful incentive to negotiate equitable and verifiable reductions in strategic force levels.

The new U.S. strategic program should raise fundamental questions for the Soviets about their heavy reliance upon vulnerable first-strike strategic weapons as the United States improves its less vulnerable second-strike capabilities. Substantial Peacekeeper (MX) deployment could result in an increase in U.S. prompt hard-target-counterforce capability to the point that the Soviets perceived a substantially greater threat to their ICBM force. Thus, Peacekeeper (MX) deployment should provide a major incentive for the Soviets also to seek ways to make their land-based ICBMs less vulnerable.

Although permitted by the basic SALT II Agreement after the expiration of the Protocol, Soviet deployment of a mobile ICBM could raise serious verification problems. Soviet technology for mobile launchers is well developed. Cooperative measures will be an essential element in any future strategic arms control agreement, and their importance will be significantly enhanced if it is necessary to monitor future Soviet ground-mobile ICBM deployments.

The Trident and Poseidon submarine and missile systems should sustain for the foreseeable future the already high survivability of the US ballistic missile submarine force. The range of the Trident I and II missiles will make available to U.S. strategic submarines far more ocean operating area than is available to SSBN's with Poseidon SLBMs, and should present a formidable problem to foreseeable Soviet ASW forces. The relatively high survivability of Trident submarines, due to increased operating area, is further enhanced by the improvement in the quietness of their operations. The Trident program will also add to the U.S. retaliatory capabilities deployed to deter a surprise attack.

As currently planned, the introduction of Trident submarines begun in FY 1981 would result in an increase in the numbers of strategic sea-based ballistic missile warheads [deleted].[37] The modernization of the U.S. sea-based strategic forces is consistent with the U.S. policy of restoring the strategic balance, enhancing stability through survivability, and creating incentives for the Soviets to enter into meaningful negotiations for arms limitation treaties. [Deleted] expected increases in the number of Soviet strategic nuclear warheads in the absence of strategic arms constraints.

The Trident II potential for hard-target-kill capability will offset the political and military benefits that the Soviets are attempting to secure by increases in their own hard-target-kill capabilities. Further, it is possible that improvements in U.S. counter-silo capabilities could move the Soviets toward a less destabilizing force configuration. Finally, an increased US hard-target-kill capability would provide the United States with an improved and enduring military capability against hard targets in the USSR.

In summary, the SSBN/SLBM and associated communication programs analyzed here have beneficial arms control implications.

In the face of improving Soviet air defenses, the procurement of ALCMs and the B-1B while developing advanced technologies is necessary to maintain the effectiveness of the strategic bomber force. The programs described in this statement will improve U.S. retaliatory capabilities and thus strengthen deterrence, enhance crisis stability, and create incentives necessary for the Soviets to respond seriously to U.S. proposals for meaningful strategic arms reductions. At the same time, the strategic bomber force clearly will pose no first-strike threat to USSR strategic forces.

The introduction of ALCMs on B-52s [deleted]. ALCM deployment must be seen in the light of the need to maintain adequate military capability to execute the national strategy and achieve U.S. national security objectives, to correct the existing strategic force imbalance, and to restore strategic stability consistent with U.S. arms control policy.

The Soviets might respond to U.S. ALCM deployments in a variety of ways, including: (a) further improvements to their air defense system; (b) acceleration of their strategic weapons buildup beyond the scope of present plans; (c) increased willingness to pursue negotiated arms limitations; or (d) some combination of the above. However, without offsetting adjustments in U.S. forces, a U.S. decision unilaterally to restrict cruise missile deployment and new bomber procurement would lead to U.S. strategic forces that were not capable of supporting U.S. national security objectives.

Programs to ensure the continued effectiveness of the airborne strategic offensive force support U.S. arms control and national security goals of deterring nuclear war or coercion, and maintaining international stability through the preservation of a credible threat of assured retaliation. These programs contribute to the reliability, survivability, and penetrativity of the air-breathing element of the strategic Triad and are consistent with U.S. arms control objectives.

The Soviets currently possess an operational ASAT and the United States does not. The arms control policy with regard to space defense is consistent with a U.S. space defense program which:

—will provide a capability to negate Soviet military satellites that directly support Soviet combat forces;

—will provide a capability that would deter the Soviets from using their ASAT against U.S. space systems;

—indicates U.S. determination not to permit a Soviet antisatellite system monopoly; —will provide a hedge against Soviet cheating or covert deployment of an effective antisatellite system in the event an ASAT agreement is reached;

—is consistent with U.S. obligations under the Outer Space Treaty, the UN Charter, the ABM Treaty, the International Telecommunications Convention, the Convention on Registration of Objects Launched into Outer Space, and the Direct Communications Link Modernization Agreement; —would not adversely affect other arms control negotiations;

—[deleted];

—is not likely to lead to third-country development of antisatellite systems; and

—[deleted].

Many potential provisions of [deleted].

. . . . . .

The FY 1984 U.S. Ballistic Missile Defense program is consistent with the ABM Treaty and supports U.S. arms control and national security policy. It is consistent with current and prospective arms control negotiations. The program is designed to: (1) avoid technological surprise, (2) provide a BMD technology base to hedge against Soviet violation or abrogation of the ABM Treaty, (3) improve the potential for U.S. ICBM survivability, and (4) provide deployment options as a hedge to counter Soviet threat growth. It also supports our ability to assess the capabilities of U.S. ICBMs and SLBMs to accomplish their strategic deterrent missions.

The BMD program as it is presently constituted has no adverse arms control impact.

. . . . . .

The Sea-Launched Cruise Missile program is consistent with U.S. arms control policy and related Presidential decisions and is not constrained by existing arms control agreements.

The effect of U.S. modernization programs on current and prospective arms control negotiations has already been demonstrated in the INF talks. It was not until faced with the prospect of PII and GLCM deployments that the USSR displayed a willingness to engage in substantive arms control negotiations. With respect to potential future arms control agreements, mobile systems such as cruise missiles are likely to present difficulties for verification.

The impact of SLCM on global and regional stability is largely a function of [deleted].

[Deleted].

In summary, the SLCM program is important to deterrence and stability. Like any nuclear modernization program, however, it entails political costs and carries with it important arms control implications. In this regard, we will continue to ensure that this program is consistent with our overall national security objectives, including the development of future options for reducing nuclear arms and ensuring deterrence and global stability.

Both the Pershing II and GLCM programs are consistent with U.S. arms control policy and related Presidential decisions and are not constrained by existing arms control agreements.

The effect of U.S. modernization programs on current and prospective arms control negotiations has already been demonstrated in the INF talks. In the face of Allied resolve to go forward with INF deployments, the Soviets dropped their preconditions for entering into negotiations with the United States. U.S. modernization programs could engender further modernization of Soviet INF. On balance, however, there would be little prospect for concrete arms control results involving INF in the absence of NATO's decision to modernize these forces.

Deployment of U.S. PII and cruise missiles is intended to redress a dangerous imbalance caused by the Soviet deployment of large numbers of highly capable SS-20 missiles, in addition to existing Soviet LRINF weapons. Thus, U.S. and NATO modernization, in the absence of concrete arms control results, is designed to enhance global and regional stability, both militarily and politically. While the Soviets could take military steps that would further aggravate LRINF imbalances, we are working in Geneva, in close consultations with our allies, to seek an arms control solution.

The technological implications of these programs are likely to be [deleted].

PII and GLCM have synergistic effects with each other, battlefield tactical nuclear systems, and other nuclear weapons. INF interact with both conventional and U.S. strategic forces in the doctrine of flexible response, providing for enhanced deterrence and the possibility of escalation control should deterrence fail. They also allow overall improvements to the survivability and stability of NATO's theater nuclear posture. The Alliance's decision on new longer-range INF missile systems strikes a balance so as to enhance deterrence by providing NATO with more effective LRINF, while not undermining the credibility of the U.S. strategic commitment to NATO, nor unnecessarily provoking Soviet responses detrimental to Western security.

NATO's decision to modernize its longer-range INF missiles provides for the deployment of Pershing II and GLCM, without increasing the current nuclear weapons stockpile in Europe. The modernization decision includes a parallel NATO decision on an arms control approach to the Soviet Union involving LRINF.

With respect to potential future arms control agreements, [deleted].

In summary, the U.S. Pershing II and GLCM programs are important to deterrence and stability. Like any nuclear modernization program however, they entail political costs and carry with them important arms control implications. In this regard, we will continue to ensure that these programs are consistent with our overall national security objectives, including the development of future options for limiting nuclear arms to ensure deterrence and global stability.

. . . . . .

Modernization of NATO short-range nuclear weapons is consistent with U.S. arms control policy and would not be affected by existing or prospective arms control agreements. Improvements planned for these weapons could increase NATO's capability to deter a conventional or nuclear attack by the Warsaw Pact. Moreover, if deterrence fails, these weapons could enhance NATO's capability to terminate the conflict at the lowest possible level. In the event of any decision to deploy ER weapons, full consultations would take place with any ally on whose territory such weapons would be based.

These modernized weapons provide significant improvements in the range, accuracy and reliability of warhead yield in the case of AFAPs, and for both Lance and AFAPs provide improvements in command and control, as well as safety and security improvements over older nuclear weapons. They, therefore, contribute to stability through greater operational control, survivability, reliability, and flexibility in use.

Elimination of the use of chemical weapons is a national security objective of the United States. The ongoing use of mycotoxins and other chemical weapons in SEA and Afghanistan underscores its importance. U.S. policies to achieve this objective have two interrelated and complementary aspects. The first deals with chemical weapons arms control and disarmament, the second with military strategies and capabilities to deter and, if necessary, defend against chemical warfare. Essentially, chemical weapons arms control is to be pursued, and appropriate military capabilities are to be maintained, until such time as verifiable international agreements can be concluded which effectively remove existing and future threats of chemical warfare.

Given the many technical, as well as political, difficulties which remain to be resolved, conclusion of an effective chemical weapons prohibition is not a real possibility for the foreseeable future. Active RDT&E of both deterrent retaliatory and defensive CW needs, procurement of an improved CW protective capability and the initiation of the modernization of the deteriorating chemical retaliatory capability are necessary for our defense so as to deter Soviet use of CW against us or our allies. They are consistent with U.S. arms control policy and, by helping to eliminate the existing large asymmetry in U.S.–USSR CW capabilities, will give the United States the vital negotiating leverage that is absolutely essential if the Soviet Union is to be convinced that it is in its interests [deleted].

The high energy laser and particle beam concepts represent new technologies with potential weapon applications. [Deleted].

[Deleted].

[Deleted].

The ABM potential of DE weapons has arms control implications because the 1972 ABM Treaty bans the development, testing, and deployment of all ABM systems and components that are sea-based, air-based, space-based, or mobile land-based. The Treaty does allow the development and testing of fixed, land-based ABM systems and components based on other physical principles (such as lasers or particle beams), including such fixed, land-based components capable of substituting for ABM interceptor missiles, ABM launchers, or ABM radars. The Treaty, however, prohibits the deployment of such fixed, land-based systems and components unless the Parties consult and amend the Treaty.

[Deleted].

Possible limits on antisatellite systems have been addressed by the United States and the Soviets. [Deleted]. The question of ASAT arms control is presently under review.

Given a DE weapon-related arms control agreement, the US would insist on adequate verification measures. NTM alone may not be adequate and some form of "cooperative" measures may be required to contribute to mutual confidence.

[Deleted].

[Deleted], though the DE-related R&D efforts funded in this FY 1984 budget have no more than marginal arms control effects now, this technology deserves continuing attention in the future.

Remarks by President Reagan, May 5, 1983 (Extracts) [38]

Reaction to Catholic Bishops' Pastoral Letter

Q. Mr. President, the Roman Catholic bishops, as you know, voted overwhelmingly yesterday in favor of a resolution calling for a halt in the nuclear arms race. Is that going to complicate your administration's efforts in trying to head off the nuclear freeze movement?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't really think so, particularly if those of you who are going to be commenting on this will wait, as we have to, until we have a chance to see the 45,000-word letter. [39] I think that too much attention was being paid to the one word, "curb" or "halt," when you think there's 45,000 words in toto. We haven't received it yet. I have had some information in advance about it, which indicates that it really is a legitimate effort to do exactly what we're doing, and that is to try to find ways toward world peace. And if so, then we're both doing the same thing.

Q. But isn't it true that if a number of leading Catholic bishops—archbishops, cardinals such as we've seen during this debate—go around the country, either to their parishes or in other forums, and say, as they are saying, that we think nuclear—the use of nuclear weapons is wrong—and some of them are saying, in fact, we see no way that nuclear weapons should ever be used—isn't that going to have an influence on the debate?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, is it really? Is there anyone that really favors using those weapons or that wants to see them? Our own proposals in START and INF are aimed at starting to reduce those weapons. And my own hope is that maybe once we start, that we can completely eliminate them. What we're talking about is a weapon that is so contrary to what used to be, before Hitler invented total war—what used to be the policy of all nations by way of the Geneva rules and regulations concerning warfare. And that is that you did not make civilians targets of war. We used to have very specific rules about that in the rules of warfare. And then came total war in World War II, and, yes, all of the nations finally were doing it with the conventional weapons, bombing and so forth.

But this now—can anyone—granted that your weapons are targeted on weapons, but this kind of weapon can't help but have an effect on the population as a whole. So they're not saying anything we don't say, that God forbid those weapons should ever be used.

Q. Are you saying that based on what you've seen so far, there is nothing inconsistent in the bishops' letter with your administration's policies?

THE PRESIDENT. As I say, I have not seen it yet and 45,000 words are a lot to digest. But what I'm saying is that I think their purpose is the same as ours. They're looking for a way toward peace and promoting world peace. And that's what we're also looking for. And I think that—just deal in the specifics. And so far, all of the accounts of this, and all of the reporting has dealt on that one word as if the difference between "curb" and "halt"—we've had some indications that, in reality, there are many things in there that we'll have no quarrel with at all.

Statement by President Reagan, May 5, 1983 [40]

Reaction to House of Representatives Vote on a Nuclear Freeze Resolution

Nearly 2 months ago, the House of Representatives began a serious debate about alternative approaches to arms control. This debate, one of the longest in the history of the House, not only elevated understanding of the issues but made it clear that the issues themselves are enormously complex. There are no easy answers to arms control.

During this debate, it became apparent to more and more members of the House that an immediate freeze, while superficially appealing, is fundamentally flawed. For more than 30 years, we have maintained world peace because the United States maintained effective forces of deterrence; we must not jeopardize our ability to keep the peace. Nor can we lock the United States into a position of inferiority. And we must not take any steps that would disrupt the highly sensitive arms reduction negotiations underway in Geneva.

I am pleased that a great number in Congress came to recognize the threats posed by a simple "freeze now" approach and passed amendments that sought to improve the final resolution passed by the House. The Levitas amendment [41] was especially welcome because it recognizes the importance of arms reduction in achieving genuine arms control.

The balance of the resolution that was passed last night [42] is ambiguous and, indeed, so internally inconsistent that interpretation is difficult. For example, the resolution calls for a freeze while also expressing the need for maintaining equivalence and a stable international balance. As stated many times before, this administration agrees that the maintenance of an arms balance is essential. But an immediate freeze would prevent us from having it. In sum, the resolution finally adopted by the House, while greatly improved, is not an answer to arms control that I can responsibly support.

Should this debate now move on to the Senate, I am confident that the doubts and opposition to a simple freeze now will continue to grow. In the meantime, this administration will continue to press forward vigorously at the negotiating table for arms reductions that I believe remain the best, true hope for peace and stability.

Letter From President Reagan to Senator Charles H. Percy, May 12, 1983 [43]

Response to Congressional Letter on Scowcroft Report and Build-Down Proposal

DEAR SENATOR PERCY: Thank you for your recent letter [44] on our strategic modernization program and its relationship to our arms control proposals. Your letter represents the bi-partisan spirit which I believe will help achieve our common goals of ensuring effective deterrent forces and equitable and verifiable arms reductions.

[41] The amendment proposed by Representative Elliott H. Levitas required suspension of a freeze agreement if it were not followed by mutual arms reductions within a specified period of time.

[42] House Joint Resolution 13 was adopted by the House of Representatives on May 4 by a vote of 278 to 149.

[43] Source: Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, May 16, 1983, pp. 704–705. Identical letters were sent to Senators Sam Nunn and William S. Cohen.

[44] The letter to President Reagan was signed by Senators Percy, Nunn, and Cohen. The text of the letter, dated April 29, 1983, appears in United States-Soviet Relations: Hearings Before the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington 1983), Part 2, pp. 41–43. For the President's reply to Senator Cohen, see ibid., pp. 43–44.

The fundamental U.S. goal in negotiations concerning arms reduction, and especially in our approach to the START negotiations, is to seek agreements that would enhance security and stability by reducing overall force levels while permitting modernization of U.S. forces necessary for a credible deterrent. As you know, the Scowcroft Commission noted that elements of our START proposal are consistent with and supportive of the Commission's findings. I agree wholeheartedly with the essential theme of the Scowcroft Commission's approach to arms control: the attainment of stability at the lowest possible level of forces.

The Scowcroft Commission's recommendations on modernization and arms control are integrally related.[45] Our action with respect to these recommendations must be equally comprehensive. That is why I am now reviewing our START proposal in order to develop such modifications as are necessary to reflect the Commission's approach, which I share. To cite just one example, the Commission report recommended that the proposed limit on deployed ballistic missiles currently contained in the U.S. START position be reassessed since it is not compatible with a desirable evolution toward small, single-warhead ICBMs. There are a number of alternative approaches available to integrate this and the other Commission recommendations into our approach to arms reductions. As modifications are made to our START proposal, I will continue to seek stability at the lowest possible level of forces.

The planned deployment of the Peacekeeper missile as proposed by my Administration is compatible with the long-term objective of the Scowcroft Commission Report. The Peacekeeper missile, deployed in a mix with small single-warhead ICBMs, would permit us to maintain the effectiveness of our deterrent and enhance stability.

At the same time, let me emphasize that we do not seek a first strike capability. To this end, we will constrain the number of Peacekeeper missiles to the minimum number needed to assure the effectiveness of our deterrent and no more. Our task, of course, would be much easier if the Soviets would agree to work with us to reduce the ratio of accurate warheads to missile silos. Clearly, consistent with our national security requirements, the overall level of Peacekeeper deployment will be influenced by Soviet strategic programs and arms reductions agreements.

In addition, I fully recognize the central role that the small, single-warhead ICBM plays in the overall modernization program recommended by the Scowcroft Commission Report. We will promptly undertake a major effort to bring the proposal of a small, single-warhead ICBM to fruition on a high priority basis.

In considering the implementation of the essential ICBM modernization program, the Scowcroft Commission also recognized that a series of decisions involving both the Executive Branch and the Congress would be necessary in the months ahead in order to determine the future shape of our ICBM force. Further, it noted that not all of these decisions can or should be made in 1983. The deliberate approach to decision making proposed by a number of members of Congress is fully in keeping with the intent of the Scowcroft Commission Report. I fully recognize that a lasting consensus on such an important issue must be built up carefully and I intend to take the time necessary to forge that lasting consensus.

I urge all concerned, however, to keep in mind that if we draw out critical elements of the decisionmaking process unnecessarily, we encourage the Soviets to delay in negotiations while continuing apace in their own weapons modernization programs.

To avoid this, I am seeking a clear show of support from Congress to signal U.S. resolve. A case in point is the clear necessity of approving funds promptly to procure Peacekeeper missiles. Working together, this should be achievable while simultaneously meeting our mutual desire to deal with deployment issues, whenever possible, in a careful, deliberate manner.

You have suggested that certain additional initiatives could be helpful in moving us toward our goals of security and stability at reduced levels of forces. One of the most prominent of these initiatives is the idea of a "guaranteed build-down."[46]

Continued

The principle of a mutual build-down, if formulated and implemented flexibly, and negotiated within the context of our modified START proposal, would be a useful means to achieve the reductions that we all seek.

It would, if properly applied, reinforce our intent to cap the number of strategic ballistic missile warheads on both sides and to cause each side to reduce those levels steadily and substantially over time.

It could be implemented flexibly and with reasonable latitude for each side to balance the forces it deploys and reduces. Variable ratios as appropriate, would encourage more stabilizing rather than less stabilizing systems.

It could be implemented in conjunction with an agreed floor which, when reached, would trigger the suspension of the build-down rule, subject to renegotiation.

As you have acknowledged, any build-down concept must recognize the importance of strategic modernization and the necessity of maintaining a balance during the reduction process to deal with asymmetries in U.S. and Soviet forces. It would, of course, require agreement on effective verification measures, including counting rules for all systems.

My Administration is currently examining the structure of a build-down proposal which would meet these criteria and would facilitate a START agreement embodying substantial reductions in nuclear forces. I will work with you and your colleagues to develop such a proposal.

Finally, I want to stress the extraordinary contribution made by the Scowcroft Commission. It provided an opportunity for non-partisan analysis of an exceptionally difficult issue as a prelude to obtaining necessary bipartisan support for critically needed modernization of our strategic forces. While not prescribing the details or the timing, the Commission report suggested certain directions that the continued evolution of our complementary strategy for arms reduction could take. Over the short term, follow-on arrangements involving members of the Commission, as well as close coordination with the Congress, will be extremely helpful both technically and politically in thinking through this evolution. However, we are giving careful consideration to determining which follow-on arrangements best meet our common objectives.

In this regard, I do see merit in a panel with bipartisan composition and with staggered terms of membership to provide advice and continuity in this area. I will work with the Congress, building upon the experience of the Scowcroft Commission, to strengthen and supplement our consultative and advisory processes to assure a lasting, national, bipartisan consensus concerning arms control initiatives—a consensus which will deserve to be sustained from one Administration to the next.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN

Statement by President Reagan, June 8, 1983 [47]

Adjustment of START Proposals To Reflect Scowcroft Commission Recommendations

Good morning. The strategic arms talks, or START as we have named it, officially resumed today in Geneva. And I would like to speak for a moment about my hopes for these important negotiations and about changes which I've decided to make in our START proposal. Such changes reflect concerns and recommendations of the Scowcroft Commission, the Congress and others. They offer the prospect of new progress toward a START agreement.

Before discussing these specifics, I would like to comment on what I see as very positive developments taking place both here and abroad.

I'm happy to say that today there's a growing sense that we're making progress. I just met in Williamsburg, as you perhaps have heard, with the leaders of the major industrialized nations,[48] and I was struck there, not only by the facts and figures pointing toward economic recovery, but also by a spirit of optimism and cooperation which was remarkable. This same spirit is visible in our discussion on security issues.

In NATO, as in other alliances, there's a new feeling of partnership. The Atlantic Alliance is alive and well and its close consultations are a source of strength and participation for each of its members. At least as important, and very gratifying to me, is the new spirit of bipartisanship on national security issues which is increasingly evident in both Houses of Congress.

When I established the Scowcroft Commission[49] I could not then foresee the impact that this outstanding panel would have. Clearly the commission's work, which went beyond MX to address critical issues of deterrence and arms control, has become a major stimulus to the rethinking of national policy. The commission's report challenged some favorite assumptions and called for changes in our strategic planning. At the same time, it expressed support for my administration's most heartfelt objectives in arms control: deep reductions, modernization for stability's sake, and the elimination of the first-strike threat.

I have pledged to Congress my full support for the Scowcroft Commission recommendations and my intention to incorporate them in our START proposal. So that we can continue to benefit from the wisdom of its counsel, I intend to ask the commission to continue to serve. Its bipartisan membership will thus be able to provide timely advice to me, both with respect to the adoption of its proposals into our defense program, and our arms control policies.

In recent weeks, I and officials of my administration have had an extensive series of private meetings with many Members of Congress. We've reviewed implications for the START negotiations of the Scowcroft Commission recommendations and also of the the mutual guaranteed build-down advocated by a number of distinguished Members of the Congress. The review of our START position was capped by four recent meetings, three yesterday and one today.

Yesterday morning at a meeting of the National Security Council, my senior advisers and I reviewed major implications and options. We also considered a range of congressional viewpoints.

Yesterday afternoon I met with groups of Senators and Congressmen whose interest and expertise in arms control I value highly. I discussed with them the major issues before us.

And this morning I met with the leadership of both Houses of the Congress. And throughout the START negotiations the administration has consulted with our allies.

Three full rounds of negotiations of START are now behind us. It's my judgment that these rounds have been useful and have permitted us to cover necessary ground. However, due largely to Soviet intransigence, we have not yet made meaningful progress on the central issues. I remain firmly committed to take whatever steps are necessary to increase the likelihood of real substantive progress toward an agreement involving significant reductions in U.S. and Soviet strategic nuclear arsenals and in the national security interests of both sides.

Above all, our goal is to maintain a stable nuclear balance in order to reduce the risk of war. Our efforts in the START negotiations must be guided by that objective.

The report of the Scowcroft Commission offers us a new opportunity for progress. It has provided a consistent and coherent framework to guide our thinking about the fundamental elements of our national security policy—deterrence, defense, and arms control. But, more than that, it has provided the basis for renewed, bipartisan support for that policy.

To capitalize on this critical opportunity and on the basis of the widest possible range of advice, I have directed new steps toward progress in achieving real arms reductions at the START negotiations. The purpose of this guidance, provided to Ambassador Ed Rowny, our Chief START Negotiator, is to adjust the U.S. START position to bring it into line with the Scowcroft Commission's recommendations and to provide additional flexibility to our negotiators in pursuing our basic goals.

Although we have put forth a comprehensive proposal on limiting strategic ballistic missiles and bombers, our primary aim in the START negotiations has been, and continues to be, to reduce the threat posed by the most destabilizing systems, namely ballistic missiles. To achieve that aim, measures that constrain the number and destructive capability and potential of ballistic missile warheads are essential. Our proposed limit of 5,000 total ballistic missile warheads—a reduction by one-third of the current level—remains the central element of the U.S. START position.

The U.S. START position tabled in previous negotiating rounds includes another constraint. It would have limited each side to no more than 850 deployed ballistic missiles. This measure was never viewed as being as useful or important a constraint as the limit on total ballistic-missile warheads.

The Scowcroft Commission Report specifically suggested that it should be reassessed since it could constrain the evolution we seek towards small, single-warhead ICBMs. Acting upon the Commission's recommendation, I have now directed our negotiators to adjust our position on deployed ballistic missiles by relaxing our current proposal for an 850 deployed ballistic missile limit.

At the same time, the United States remains firm on the point that the destructive capability and potential of ballistic missiles must be addressed in START. Our current position includes a network of constraints designed to lead toward a more stable, strategic balance at reduced force levels while addressing the destructive potential of missiles.

The Soviets and others have complained that these constraints are designed to dictate Soviet force structure, according to U.S. standards. This is not the case. We believe, as does the Scowcroft Commission that ability, or stability, can be increased by limitations on the destructive capability and potential of ballistic missiles. As a consequence, we will continue to propose such constraints which indirectly get to the throwweight problem while making clear to the Soviets our readiness to deal directly with the corresponding destructive capability, if they prefer.

There may be more than one way to achieve our objective of greater stability at reduced levels of arms. So I've instructed Ambassador Rowny to make clear to the Soviet delegation our commitment to our fundamental objectives; but I have also given him the flexibility to explore all appropriate avenues for meeting our goals. I sincerely hope that the Soviet Union will respond with corresponding flexibility.

Finally, high priority work is continuing on how the mutual and guaranteed build-down concept proposed by several U.S. Senators can be applied in our quest for significant and stabilizing strategic arms reductions.

These actions reflect a bipartisan consensus on arms control and new flexibility in the negotiations, steps to be viewed by the Soviets and all others who have a stake in world peace. To the leaders of the Soviet Union, I urge that this new opportunity not be lost. To America's friends and allies around the world, I say that your steadfast support for the goals of both deterrence and arms control is essential in the future. To Congress and to the American people, I say let us continue to work together in a bipartisan spirit so that these days will be spoken of in the future as the time when America turned a corner. Let us put our differences behind us. Let us demonstrate measured flexibility in our approach while remaining strong in our determination to reach our objectives of arms reduction, stability and security. Let us be leaders in the cause of peace. Thank you. (Applause)

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of State (Shultz), June 22, 1983 (Extract) [50]

Is the MX a Bargaining Chip for START?

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, there seems to be some confusion about the meaning of the terms under which the MX missile might be abandoned. Is this meant as a serious negotiating offer, or is it meant to simply convey the idea that it would be very, very difficult to talk us out of the MX?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think this blow-up today [51] about that subject is puzzling because I don't think that there's anything particularly new to be said on the subject.

Let me just review where we are. The first point to remember is that the Peacekeeper, or MX, as it is deployed, will be a very important modernization of the land-based leg of our Triad deterrent force. That's the fundamental reason why the President is recommending it, the Scowcroft Commission recommended it, and why it's being funded and put there.

At the same time, we are in the process of a wide-ranging discussion with the Soviet Union aiming at reductions in strategic arms. That's including the whole variety of arms that fall under that category. So all of these things are under discussion.

But I don't think there is anything particular to recommend, picking out a particular element in that bargaining and trying to place it against some other element in that bargaining. If we are able to reach a result, which I hope very much that we are, there will be a package of things that will be worked out between the parties, and that's always the way it is in any complicated bargain, not an equation of any one thing.

Q. Mr. Secretary, on that point a number of people in Congress have said that they believe the MX was essentially put forth as a bargaining chip. But General Scowcroft himself has said that is not the case, that there are no conditions under which it would not be deployed.

Was it meant to be a bargaining chip?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think I've just answered that question, but I'll try it again. The reason for the proposed deployment and eventually the deployment of the MX or Peacekeeper missile is that it constitutes a key ingredient in the land-based leg of the triad of deterrent forces. That is the basic sum and substance of it.

We are engaged in a bargaining process, and the bargaining process is about strategic forces. The MX or Peacekeeper is part of those strategic forces, so it's something that has to be taken account of in those discussions. It's basically as simple as that.

"Dear Mr. Chairman: At yesterday's hearing Senator Pell asked whether under any circumstances the U.S. would be prepared to give up the MX program?

"The following is my answer for the record: The President has made clear that the scale of MX deployment will be influenced by Soviet strategic programs and arms reduction agreements. The MX is the U.S. response to a massive build-up of Soviet ICBMs over the last 10 years, and unless the Soviets are prepared to reverse this build-up and forego their heavy and medium ICBMs, the U.S. will go forward with MX."

Testimony by the Deputy Secretary of State (Dam) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, June 23, 1983 (Extract) [52]

Structure for Preparation of U.S. START Negotiating Position

SENATOR BIDEN. . . . I would like to talk about the negotiating structure within the administration. Who is in charge? Is it Mr. Rowny? Who has the President's ear? Who is the person the President most listens to on arms control? Mr. Rowny? Mr. Clark? Mr. Adelman? You? The Secretary of State? And I am not being facetious. Who? Could you tell us that? Who is the most influential person with the President on this issue?

MR. DAM. I can answer the first part of the question, which I understand is not what you are trying to get at, when you ask, who is in charge? There is no question about the fact the President is in charge.

SENATOR BIDEN. Who after the President?

MR. DAM. I do want to emphasize that, because I have to say that having attended that very well publicized NSC meeting, [53] there is no question about the fact that in the discussion of the START position, the President was very much on top of the issues, and very much in charge, and understands the issues. It was an excellent meeting.

Now, that being said, there is an NSC structure which provides for interagency work coming together in NSC meetings. Now, the—

SENATOR BIDEN. Now, who heads that? I am going to ask questions that are obvious on their face, but I would like them answered. Who heads those NSC meetings? Who carries the substantive issues in the NSC meetings on arms control? Who chairs those?

MR. DAM. The President chairs it. I am not going to get into details of specific NSC meetings, but—

SENATOR BIDEN. No, I do not want to know—

MR. DAM. They are chaired by the President. The job of the National Security Advisor is essentially to construct agendas. The normal person who speaks first, and in some sense is looked to for overall direction is the Secretary of State, and certainly the Secretary of State has been spending a lot of time on this question. He has gotten very deeply into the issues. In my judgment, he understands it extremely well. Not only has he mastered the technical details, but he also—and this should not be surprising for people who know him—understands very well the psychology of the negotiations, and how they have developed, and how they should be expected to develop.

Now, there obviously is a very important role for the Department of Defense, and that includes the Joint Chiefs of Staff, because they obviously have the greatest knowledge of the weapons systems. There is obviously a role for the Central Intelligence Agency. There is an important role for the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency.

SENATOR BIDEN. Who prepares the ultimate negotiating—I do not want to know it; but who prepares the document that is the recommended negotiation position as they change? Who hands that to the President? Who prepares it, and who hands it to the President, understanding the President may discard it, change it, know so much about it he writes it all by himself, but who presents—who is in charge of preparing that paper?

MR. DAM. There is an interagency group.

SENATOR BIDEN. I know that, but one person heads that. Who does that?

MR. DAM. I believe that in the START case the principal actor is Admiral Howe.

SENATOR BIDEN. And for whom does he work?

MR. DAM. Admiral Howe is in the State Department. He is in charge of our Politi-[53] Reference is presumably to the National Security Council meeting held on June 7, 1983, at which, according to the Washington Post, May 30, 1983, p. A1, the differences between the Departments of State and Defense on the new START position were scheduled to be resolved.

cal Military Bureau. He has the advantage that he not only is within the State Department and has been for some time, and has good knowledge of all of the diplomatic aspects of it, but he also is a military officer.

SENATOR BIDEN. So it goes from Howe to the President?

MR. DAM. Well, the purpose of the NSC structure is to be the President's White House staff. The staff is the President's staff, and they structure the meetings essentially, under the statute. Obviously the handing out of things and the construction of the agenda are a job for the President's staff. But there are no surprises here. One does not go to a meeting and find that there is some other agenda than what we have been preparing for all the time.

SENATOR BIDEN. No, I am not talking about the agenda. For example, let me be more specific. Let us assume that, and since we have established for the record that the Adelman letter [54] was not a proposal, let us assume, since that is not the case, and everybody knows that now, let us assume that was the proposal that Mr. Rowny was going to be instructed to table.

Now, as knowledgeable as the President may be on this issue, unless he is unlike any other President, including ones who were known for their great knowledge of this issue, like President Nixon, unless—even he, because he was such a busy man, and all Presidents are, there is one last person that talks to the President, and by the way, you have been in the bureaucracy long enough. If I have to have a job working for a President, I do not care what the title is, I want to be the last guy to talk to him, no matter what. I think we both agree that that is a strategic position to be in. No matter what the title. No matter how important. I want to be the last guy other than the doorman, you know—

MR. DAM. I was going to mention the doorman.

SENATOR BIDEN. The doorman in this administration's case may have influence. I do not know. [General laughter.] [55]

But I should not be so facetious. I should not have said that. I am sorry. But I could not resist that, and it is not really true. [General laughter.]

Anyway, I want to get back on the point. So, I was being a wise guy then, but I am not being a wise guy now, when I try to identify who is the person that finally hands the President that position and says, we will trade—if it were a position, 100 MX's or 1,000 MX warheads for 5,300 or whatever it was SS–18's and SS–19's. Who would be the guy to hand that to the President to get the President to sign off?

MR. DAM. Well, let us retrace the process a little bit. You have this interagency group which meets. It meets under the chairmanship of an officer of the Department of State.

SENATOR BIDEN. And who would that be?

MR. DAM. That is Admiral Jon Howe. Normally, the State Department would prepare the options papers, but everybody will read them. It is all cleared on an interagency basis, so it is an agreed paper. It is transmitted to the President through the National Security Council staff.

SENATOR BIDEN. And who is that? That is Clark?

MR. DAM. Judge Clark. Mr. McFarlane. There are other people over there. Mr. Lehman, who is an expert on arms control. They are all there. Who actually hands it to him I do not happen to know. I do happen to know that other people speak to the President privately about these matters, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Defense. I am sure that on occasion the Chiefs have met with the President of the United States.

I do not put as much importance on that question, perhaps, as you do, though I obviously understand that it is of some importance. Let me remind you that the staff of the President has been chosen by the President because he has confidence in his staff, and so they do what he wants them to do.

SENATOR BIDEN. I understand that dilemma. Though you may not view it as a dilemma, I view it as a dilemma. My concern is this. For example, this committee would be considerably less active on this issue, in my view, if we thought the relationship on arms control questions, and I know my time is up—Senator Boschwitz, do you mind if I keep going?

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ [presiding]. I know that we have a vote on, Senator, and I would like to say a word or two to the Secretary privately before he leaves.

SENATOR BIDEN. OK. Well, if in fact we knew that the relationship on arms control issues between the Secretary of State and the President was like it was with Ford and Kissinger, or like it was with Kissinger and Nixon, you would find concern up at this end of the Hill being dissipated a great deal.

Our concern, to be very blunt, is that the people the President has reposed his confidence in do not have a lot of knowledge about arms control on the one hand, or have a long track record of believing that arms control is counterproductive. Judge Clark came to the job—maybe he is such a quick learner, but he came to the job with as much knowledge about arms control as I did when I was an undergraduate at the University of Delaware in 1960, and I believe I probably knew more then than he.

Now, you know my views about Judge Clark. I think he is a fine guy, but his promise to us when he was confirmed was, do not worry, I will not be making policy. I am paraphrasing what he said in the record. It was, do not worry, I am not going to be making policy. That was reassuring to 99 percent of us.

Our concern now is that he is playing a big role in making policy. So that is why I have pursued this with such detail. I am not sure even if your answer were different from what you gave me, I am not sure you could sit there and say, well, it is true, the most influential man on arms control with the President is Judge Clark, or the Secretary of State.

Do you believe the Secretary of State to be the most influential man with the President on arms control? Do you believe that man to be the Secretary of State? And I will not ask you who it is if it is not him.

MR. DAM. Well, I do believe so, and I believe so particularly because I believe that arms control is part of our overall relationship with the Soviet Union, and I do believe that the Secretary of State is certainly the dominant figure in developing that policy. Let me say this. I am a great admirer of Judge Clark, but I do not think it makes any difference. I think you ought to judge by what you think of the positions.

Andropov's Anti-Satellite Weapons Proposal to U.S. Senators in Moscow

. . . . . .

Q. Is the United States going ahead with the development of the antisatellite weapons, or has that been altered in any way by Andropov's proposal yesterday? [57]

A. I think we addressed this yesterday. I guess you weren't here.

Q. You said you were going to carefully study it, but apparently a test is scheduled. Will that test be cancelled or delayed?

A. I guess you would have to ask the appropriate agencies on that. I think I could give you some further words on the proposal yesterday, but I don't—let me just give you what I've got.

[57] Reference is to a meeting between Andropov and eight U.S. Senators at the Kremlin on August 18. At the meeting, Andropov offered a unilateral moratorium on anti-satellite weapons in space and proposed a new treaty on space weapons that included for the first time the dismantling of systems now in existence. The report of the Senate delegation, which visited the Soviet Union between August 17 and 28, and was headed by Senator Claiborne Pell, included transcripts of all official statements and the text of the draft treaty. For text of the report, see Dangerous Stalemate: Superpower Relations in Autumn 1983: A Report of a Delegation of Eight Senators to the Soviet Union to the United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session, Senate Document 98–16 (Washington, September 1983).

Because of its ambiguous language, the precise proposal is not clear. For example, Mr. Andropov is quoted as saying the Soviets "will not be the first to put anti-satellite weapons in space." However, the Soviets have tested their ASAT system in space repeatedly, and it's been operational for about a dozen years.

Part of the proposal is similar to their 1981 draft treaty submitted at the United Nations [58] and suffers from the same problems. For example, it is not clear about the definition of the weapon, and there are no provisions for verification.

Their proposed moratorium on ASAT activities is new, but also suffers from problems. These include unilateral advantage to the Soviets, who have an operational system, and verification.

With regard to the problems of verification, there's also the difficulty of verifying effectively the dismantling and destruction of the operational Soviet ASAT system.

First, the system is relatively small. It's fitted into a Soviet space booster used for other space launch missions. We don't know how many such ASAT systems have been manufactured and it would be relatively easy for the Soviets to maintain a covert supply of interceptors for use in a crisis.

Second, since satellites which serve U.S. and allied national security are very few in number, any Soviet cheating on an ASAT agreement, even on a small scale, could pose a prohibitive risk.

Q. Back on the—I'm puzzled about the Andropov proposal. Since neither antisatellite system, either side, is supposed to be stationed in space, rather acquired from the ground, is he not perhaps opening up a new pathway to negotiate on the so-called Star Wars permanent orbiting systems that the President has suggested? [59]

A. I can't tell you what he has specifically in mind. Obviously, there are existing mechanisms for discussing these other than through visitors. And as I said yesterday, we would seriously consider any serious proposal, but I don't have any new words on that.

Q. Are you actually saying that the President would seriously consider proposals on the space-based laser initiative? He announced that last March 23, and in the following weeks the statements that he and the Secretary made were quite—

A. That program, of course, is in a stage where we're talking about design and engineering and experimenting, and things like that. Any serious ideas the Soviets have on any of these issues, obviously we're willing to discuss. We said we wanted to discuss this idea with them in fact. The President made that quite clear.

Q. That was not to not develop these things; that was to discuss with the Soviets a sort of joint competition in development.

A. We would hope they would want to discuss what we had in mind as well as what they had.

Q. Could I ask you one other thing? Have you asked them for clarification?

A. No.

Prepared Statement by the Ambassador at Large and the Secretary of State's Special Adviser on Nonproliferation Policy and Nuclear Energy Affairs (Kennedy) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and a Subcommittee of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, September 30, 1983 [60]

U.S. Nonproliferation Efforts and Policies

I welcome the opportunity to meet with you today to discuss the Administration's program for preventing the spread of nuclear weapons. It has been about a year since we have had an oversight hearing on this important issue before your committees. [61] You have invited me to discuss a number of very significant topics, including the International Atomic Energy Agency, the question of spare parts for the Tarapur reactors in India, recent discussions we have had with the Soviet Union, the People's Republic of China, Argentina, and Brazil, our plutonium use policy and the status of negotiations with EURATOM and Japan, the Hexapartite Safeguards Agreement, and the impact of the Supreme Court's Chadha decision. These are very significant issues and I will attempt to cover each of them in this statement.

As you may recall, in a previous appearance before you, I outlined the responsibilities and organizational relationships in the non-proliferation area—relationships which were contemplated by the President and Secretary Shultz when nominating me as Ambassador at Large with responsibility for non-proliferation matters. In that role I coordinate the efforts of the executive branch and act as the Special Representative of the Secretary and the President in discussions and negotiations with other countries on nonproliferation. I am pleased to note that over the past many months, these organizational relationships have worked well and have provided an increasingly cohesive approach to a complex, difficult and vital task. In particular, I want to express my admiration and appreciation for the excellent work done by the staff in the Bureau of Oceans, International Environmental and Scientific Affairs of the State Department, and indeed by all of the various bureaus of the Department which contribute to a fully coordinated effort. I also want to note the effective contributions of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, Department of Energy, and Department of Defense, who work together with us in support of the effort. They contributed greatly to the progress which we have made. And, of course, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission continues its important export licensing role, as well as assisting other nations with their own nuclear regulation activities. Through this effective coordinated relationship, we have been able to focus attention on the problem of proliferation, as we believe the Congress had intended.

All of our non-proliferation efforts, of course, are conducted under the guidelines provided by the President in his statement of July 16, 1981. [62] In that statement, the President laid out seven basic guidelines. They are:

1. The United States will seek to prevent the spread of nuclear explosives to additional countries as a fundamental national security and foreign policy objective.

2. The United States will strive to reduce the motivation for acquiring nuclear explosives by working to improve regional and global stability and to promote understanding of the legitimate security concerns of other states.

3. The United States will continue to support adherence to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons and to the Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America (Treaty of Tlatelolco) [63] by countries that have not accepted those treaties.

At that time, he served the Department of State as Under Secretary for Management, with responsibilities for overseeing Department of State policy on nuclear nonproliferation.

[62] For the President's statement, see ibid., 1981, pp. 171–172.

[63] For an English text of the treaty, see 22 UST 762. The United States is not a party to it.

4. The United States will view a material violation of these treaties or an international safeguards agreement as having profound consequences for international order and United States bilateral relations, and also view any nuclear explosion by a non-nuclear-weapon state with grave concern.

5. The United States will strongly support and continue to work with other nations to strengthen the International Atomic Energy Agency to provide for an improved international safeguards regime.

6. The United States will seek to work more effectively with other countries to forge agreement on measures for combatting the risks of proliferation.

7. The United States will continue to inhibit the transfer of sensitive nuclear material, equipment and technology, particularly where the danger of proliferation demands, and to seek agreement on requiring IAEA safeguards on all nuclear activities in a non-nuclear-weapon state as a condition for any significant new nuclear supply commitment.

Mr. Chairman, I would appreciate it if the President's statement could be appended to my statement for inclusion in the record.

To these guidelines, Mr. Chairman, I would like to add one additional concept which underlies our policy and which I have asserted in numerous fora—that is, that the United States will never allow its nonproliferation objectives to be undercut for commercial gain. Our policy is to put in place the most effective nonproliferation regime which we, in combination with other concerned nations, can achieve.

I would now like first to bring you up to date on several important events which have taken place since we last met and then turn to the specific areas which you asked me to address.

President Reagan's Comprehensive Safeguards Initiative

U.S. law requires IAEA safeguards on all existing nuclear activities in the recipient non-nuclear weapons state as a condition for major U.S. nuclear exports. President Reagan has called upon all supplier states to require comprehensive safeguards for their own exports. Our objective must be the establishment of agreed norms which all suppliers will honor. We have pursued this objective through bilateral consultations in capitals and in a number of discussions in Washington. These discussions will continue.

Additional Parties to the Non-Proliferation Treaty

The United States strongly supports universal adherence to the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT). The administration continues active diplomatic efforts to encourage countries not yet party to the Treaty to ratify this central instrument of the international non-proliferation regime. During 1982, four additional states became parties—Papua New Guinea, Nauru, the Socialist Republic of Vietnam and Uganda. There are now more than 115 states which are parties to the NPT, making it the most widely accepted multilateral arms control agreement. We also are taking steps to encourage implementation of the Treaty of Tlatelolco.

New Bilateral Agreements for Cooperation in the Peaceful Uses of Atomic Energy

As you know, section 404 of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 requires that the United States seek to renegotiate Agreements of Cooperation under section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954.[64] We have renegotiated our agreement with the IAEA, entered into force May 6, 1980; Canada entered into force July 9, 1980; Australia entered into force January 16, 1981; and Columbia (not yet in force). We anticipate that revised agreements with Norway and Sweden will be submitted to the Congress in the near future. We have also concluded new agreements of cooperation with several nations: Morocco (entered into force May 16, 1981), Bangladesh (entered into force June 12, 1982), Peru (entered into force April 15, 1982), Indonesia (entered into force December 30, 1981), and Egypt (entered into force December 29, 1981).

Bilateral Consultations

During the past year, U.S. officials have consulted with more than a dozen countries in Europe, Latin America and Asia on how to pursue more effectively our common goal of preventing proliferation. In these talks, we have paid specific attention to improving nuclear export controls, including the difficult task of controlling "dual use" commodities—items which have both conventional and potential nuclear uses. These meetings have helped others to understand our policies and have contributed significantly to an improved non-proliferation regime.

Improvement of U.S. Nuclear Export Regulations

On February 4, 1983, the Department of Energy issued revised and strengthened regulations which serve to control the transfer of unclassified and unpublished nuclear technology, the "Part 810" regulations.

U.S. Reprocessing of Research Reactor Fuel

The Department of Energy extended through 1987 its policy of receiving and making financial settlement for U.S.-origin spent fuels from research reactors. This policy applies to highly enriched uranium fuels which raise proliferation concerns because of their potential use in nuclear explosives.

Implementation of Voluntary Safeguards Offer

The United States voluntary offer, made several years ago, to accept safeguards on civil nuclear facilities entered into force during 1980. Under this offer, four U.S. facilities were selected by the IAEA for the application of safeguards, and in 1982, the detailed arrangements under which they are now being safeguarded were brought into force. The most significant of these four is the Exxon fuel fabrication plant where valuable experience has been gained in the effective implementation of safeguards.

Nuclear Export Alerts

Steps to make it more difficult technically for a sensitive country to acquire particular equipment or materials in pursuit of a nuclear weapons capability can buy time for other initiatives to reduce its motivations to acquire those weapons. The United States has worked in close and frequent consultation with other supplier states to shut off specific export transactions of proliferation concern. During the 1982 calendar year, approximately 100 such export alerts were pursued and about 50 have been issued so far this year.

Assistance to Non-Nuclear Weapon States in Spent Fuel Storage and Disposal

Under section 223 of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982,[65] a Federal Register notice has been published offering to augment U.S. international cooperative arrangements in the area of spent fuel storage and disposal. Non-nuclear weapon states were contacted through diplomatic channels to solicit expressions of interest. The United States was the host for a major IAEA international conference on radioactive waste management in Seattle, Washington, in May 1983.

Emerging Suppliers

A potential problem which the administration has begun to address is the expansion in the number of nations capable of exporting nuclear materials, equipment and technology. Consultations with other nations have been directed toward alerting these new suppliers to the need for effective controls on their nuclear trade to assure that it is not misused for explosives developments, thereby undermining the current system of nuclear supplier guidelines.

Ratification of Physical Security Convention

President Reagan sought and obtained enactment of domestic legislation making certain acts involving nuclear materials serious Federal crimes. This law implements certain provisions in the Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material.[66] In late 1982, the United States ratified this Convention, a major step in dealing with threats of nuclear terrorism and proliferation. The administration also remains committed in its efforts to work with other countries to assure the adequacy of physical security measures, especially where nuclear materials of U.S.-origin are involved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me address the specific items you mentioned in your letter of August 4.

Chadha Decision and the Legislative Veto [67]

Various provisions of the Atomic Energy Act as amended by the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 have provided for a legislative veto by the Congress of Presidential determinations to permit nuclear exports. Basically, these statutory provisions contain three distinct elements. First, they establish very strict and specific standards which limit the export of nuclear items. Second, they authorize the President to waive certain restrictions and permit exports if he makes certain findings. There are also requirements that such waivers and findings be reported to the Congress within a specified waiting period before those actions may become effective. The third was the legislative veto.

The Department of State made its position clear on this issue last July when Deputy Secretary Dam testified before this Committee and at a hearing before the House Foreign Affairs Committee. [68] Secretary Dam testified that the Department of State considers that those standards and that waiver authority, as well as the statutory requirement of notification to Congress and the observance of a waiting period, continue to be valid. We will continue to wait through the period during which the Congress, in the past, deliberated over its veto. During that time, the Congress may use its constitutional authority to enact new legislation if it chooses. The only provision that is invalid is the third, which permitted a legislative veto by concurrent resolution.

Secretary Dam emphasized last July, and I reiterate today, that neither the Department nor the administration intends to take advantage of the situation created by the Chadha decision to take any action which would disturb the relationship of cooperation and collaboration we have developed with the Congress over the years in the area of nuclear non-proliferation. We intend to continue consulting regularly with the Congress and its committees and taking your counsel and advice into account in reaching important decisions. Our commitment to that spirit of cooperation is strengthened rather than diminished by the Chadha decision. As Secretary Dam said last July:

> "If anything, I believe Chadha will make the departments and agencies of the executive branch more, not less, conscious that they are accountable for their actions."

Spare Parts for the Tarapur Reactors in India

With regard to India's Tarapur Atomic Power Station, the Government of India is seeking to obtain from the United States and other countries spare parts for the Tarapur reactors, which were designed and built by U.S. companies. India considers the continued operation of this facility, which is subject to IAEA safeguards, as vital to meet its electric power needs. The parts it seeks are important to furthering the safe operation of the plant. We are principally concerned with the health and safety of individuals working at the Tarapur facility and those living nearby.

It was in these circumstances that Secretary Shultz informed the Government of India during his recent visit to New Delhi [69] that the President would be prepared to take measures designed to ensure the availability from the United States of required parts that could not be supplied from other sources.

Notwithstanding the significant health and safety aspect involved, the steps which have been taken so far in this matter—and the steps we will take in the future—will be with full and careful attention to the nonproliferation considerations involved, both from the standpoint of our overall policy and that policy vis-à-vis India.

To date, we have not been able to determine whether all of the required parts will be available from non-U.S. sources.

Discussions between India and potential non-U.S. suppliers are continuing.

Discussions With the People's Republic of China

Over the course of the last several years, the People's Republic of China has developed plans for an ambitious program for the installation of a substantial number of nuclear power stations in those areas of the country where coal and hydroelectric resources are not available. Those plans call for the importing of the initial plants and, at the same time, the acquisition of the technology and the facilities to permit China's industry to manufacture much of the equipment required for the later plants.

The Chinese authorities have expressed an interest in obtaining the services of experienced U.S. firms in implementing that program. Accordingly, since 1981, the possibility of a bilateral agreement for cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy, as required by the Atomic Energy Act for significant exports of the kind that would be sought by the PRC, has been discussed with China. This administration believes that, under appropriate conditions, such cooperation would be in the interest of the United States. Conclusion of an agreement for cooperation within the terms of the Atomic Energy Act would demonstrate the readiness of the United States to expand its relationship with the PRC in areas of mutual interest and could lead to cooperation in other areas, as well. It would also provide additional opportunities to encourage China to adopt nonproliferation policies including those related to its exports of nuclear materials, equipment and technologies—policies which would be consistent with those which have been developed and adopted by the major suppliers.

The most recent discussions with the Chinese authorities took place in July, when a delegation visited Washington at the invitation of Secretary Shultz. In those discussions, nonproliferation matters were addressed extensively. Overall, good progress was made in clarifying the views of both sides. At that time, we were told that the PRC was considering joining the International Atomic Energy Agency. Since then, Director General Blix has visited Beijing to discuss PRC's interest in membership and, just recently, its formal application has been submitted. We welcome this action by the PRC as an indication of its intention to play a constructive role in non-proliferation and international cooperation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

Within the next few days, I will lead a delegation to Beijing to continue the discussions with the PRC. We will seek to confirm that we share the same basic principles regarding nonproliferation as a basis for further discussion of possible cooperation.

Bilateral Discussions With the Soviet Union

The United States and the U.S.S.R. have held two rounds of bilateral meetings on a broad range of nonproliferation issues. The first session was in Washington between December 15–17 last year and the second took place in Moscow, this June 14–16. I headed the U.S. delegation at both sessions, and the Soviet side was headed in December by Ivan Morozov, until recently Deputy Chairman of the State Committee on the Utilization of Atomic Energy, and in June by A.M. Petrosyants, Chairman of the State Committee. The talks during both rounds were frank and positive, with a very constructive exchange of views.

The discussions were divided into plenary and working group sessions. In the plenary, a wide range of issues was covered. These included prospects for strengthening the international nonproliferation regime, assuring the safe development of nuclear energy, and encouraging additional countries to sign and ratify the NPT and the newly established Convention for the Physical Security of Nuclear Materials. Discussions also took place on ways to strengthen the IAEA, and on preparations for the third review conference for the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty to be held in 1985.

Working groups held detailed discussions on specific issues, such as export controls and multilateral issues, including the IAEA and its safeguards system.

The two sides agreed that the IAEA safeguards system was crucial to the success of the international nuclear nonproliferation regime. They agreed to take steps to try to strengthen that system, and also agreed that other IAEA-sponsored activities, such as the work of the Committee on Assurances of Supply and Technical Assistance and Cooperation activities, should also be strongly supported. The Soviets expressed support for the concept of comprehensive safeguards, as recently proposed by the President, but believe the policy cannot be effective until all major suppliers adopt it.

On export issues, it was clear that the United States and the Soviets share the view that meaningful controls over nuclear exports can make a significant contribution to achieving our nonproliferation goals. The need to insure that controls evolve in respect to technological change and the spread of nuclear capabilities was dealt with in some detail. The Soviets also agreed with us that it will be important for emerging new suppliers to apply meaningful export controls and adopt standards equivalent to those in the current international nonproliferation regime.

The two rounds of discussions and the accompanying exchange of views with the Soviets on nonproliferation issues have made a useful contribution to our efforts to restrain the spread of nuclear explosives.

EURATOM and Japan Negotiations—Plutonium Use

Regarding the EURATOM and Japan negotiations on plutonium use, you may recall that in September 1982 I testified before the Subcommittee on Energy, Nuclear Proliferation and Government Processes of the Committee on Governmental Affairs on the policy decisions made by the President in June 1982 on these matters.[70] At that time, the President decided on a new approach to give our close allies in EURATOM and Japan a firmer and more predictable basis upon which to plan their vital energy programs while at the same time furthering our non-proliferation objectives, including strengthened controls over civil plutonium.

At that time, I reported that the United States was offering Japan and the countries of EURATOM new, long-term arrangements for implementation of United States consent rights over the reprocessing and use of materials subject to our agreements for peaceful nuclear cooperation. This advance, long-term approval would apply only to facilities and activities which we determine meet our strict statutory criteria. The United States would be prepared to state its intention to consent to other facilities and activities in these programs when we have sufficient information about them to make the necessary determinations under our law. Finally, I noted that these offers were being made in the context of seeking new or amended peaceful nuclear cooperation agreements with Japan and EURATOM and that the approvals would be valid only as long as the conditions provided in the agreement, including nonproliferation and statutory conditions, continued to be met. Our willingness to take these steps presumed a continuing strong commitment of these countries to our common nonproliferation efforts and to developing and implementing more effective controls over plutonium.

We have provided detailed proposals on this subject to the Government of Japan, and in the last year have had seven negotiating sessions with the Japanese, both in Washington and Tokyo, in an effort to reach agreement both on the long-term arrangement for plutonium use and on the peaceful nuclear cooperation agreement. I can report to you that we have made significant progress in a number of areas, but that there are important matters that remain to be resolved as well. As the substance of these issues is under negotiation between the two governments, I cannot go into the details in open session. I can say, however, that both sides continue serious and intense efforts to find solutions and approaches that will permit them to reach agreement at an early date. As I have always done, I will keep the Congress briefed on significant developments.

Progress with EURATOM is slower. This is understandable, since negotiations with EURATOM are complex by their nature, given the institutional arrangements that apply within the European Community, and the need for the EC Commission to consult with Member States. I can report that we provided the Community with details of our new proposals last spring. The Commission requested time to study those proposals and to consult informally with Member States. This month we have just received a number of detailed questions concerning our proposals, and we would anticipate early talks with the Commission to clarify our proposals and to agree on how to proceed thereafter.

[70] For Kennedy's testimony, see Plutonium Use Policy: Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Energy, Nuclear Proliferation and Government Processes of the Committee on Governmental Affairs, United States Senate, Ninety-seventh Congress, Second Session (Washington, 1983), pp. 2–45.

Trigger List Upgrade

You have requested an update on our efforts to improve international guidelines for controlling exports which could be used for nuclear explosives development. As you know, there are two internationally agreed trigger lists adopted by nuclear suppliers in the mid-1970's to control their export activities. They are called "trigger lists" because the export of any listed item triggers the application of safeguards on that item. The first list is linked to the Non-Proliferation Treaty, which requires safeguards on items "especially designed or prepared" for the processing or production of fissionable material. This list is implemented through the 21-member NPT Exporters Committee—also called the Zangger Committee, after its Swiss chairman. In addition to the Zangger List, there is a substantially identical trigger list not linked to the NPT, but which was implemented through the informal Nuclear Suppliers Group [71]—often referred to as the London Group because it initially met in the United Kingdom.

Both these lists have been extremely important for the effort to control sensitive nuclear exports to countries of proliferation risk. Over the past few years, however, it has become clear to us, and several other suppliers, that it would be useful to further refine and clarify the lists, in response to technological developments and the spread of nuclear capabilities to additional nations.

I am pleased to report that substantial progress has been made on this initiative. We have made a commitment to other participating governments that the detailed status of the negotiations would remain confidential until administrative arrangements can be completed. This will take a few months. I would be pleased to go into specifics with you or members of your staff in closed session; however, I can make a few comments in open session which give a general picture of our approach and the progress achieved so far.

First, we have decided to approach the trigger list upgrade on a technology-by-technology basis. We have begun the discussions of each process on a technical basis, with a small group of the key technology holders in that field. Once a technical consensus has been achieved on what refinements in the trigger list are necessary, the discussions have been expanded to other nations. The additional nations may not be centrally involved with the industrial applications of a particular technology, however, they may nonetheless be able to export certain items related to that process. Therefore, the participation of such non-technology holders is important, if the control regime is to be effective.

We began our efforts over a year ago with the gas centrifuge uranium enrichment process, because of its sensitivity and the interest being shown in the process by nations of proliferation concern. After much effort, we are near final agreement on a revised trigger list for this technology. We are making good progress on other sensitive nuclear processes, but it will take sustained effort to achieve broad agreement on the range of technologies which must be considered.

In concluding my remarks on this subject I would like to emphasize two points. First, we regard this important initiative as fully consistent with our nonproliferation obligations under Article III of the NPT and other commitments we have undertaken in the Nuclear Suppliers Group. The NSG guidelines recognize that periodic review and updating of the trigger lists may be necessary to assure that they remain effective. We are committed to this process of continuing review. Second, implementing strict nonproliferation controls and revising them periodically is not an exercise in technology denial, as some have charged. If nuclear power is to play a role in meeting the world's energy needs, world public opinion must be assured that this technology will not be diverted from its intended peaceful purposes to explosives development. Our export control system plays a key role in providing that assurance. Therefore, all nations have a stake in a non-proliferation regime which clearly demonstrates that nuclear technology will not be misused, a regime which adjusts to meet changed circumstances—whether technical or political.

[71] The Nuclear Suppliers' Group, formed in 1975, initially consisted of 7 members and subsequently expanded to 15 members. The members are the leading suppliers of nuclear technology to the rest of the world.

Hexapartite Safeguards Project

As you may know, we have recently concluded an important international effort to strengthen IAEA safeguards. In this effort, known as the Hexapartite Safeguards Project, or HSP, the countries which have developed gas centrifuge uranium enrichment technology assisted the IAEA inspectorate (and the EURATOM inspectorate) in the development of a safeguards approach for enrichment plants using this new technology.

Several years ago several countries had developed gas centrifuge enrichment technology to the point where they began to build demonstration or commercial scale plants and, pursuant to their NPT obligations, make these plants available for IAEA safeguards. The IAEA at that time had no experience safeguarding gas centrifuge enrichment plants (or any other type of enrichment plant, all of which had been located in nuclear weapons states). At the urging of the United States, a special international project was established, comprising technical experts from the six countries that have this technology, and from the safeguards inspectorates of the IAEA and EURATOM. During the next two and one-half years these experts developed a safeguards approach that provides effective safeguards while properly protecting the technology.

In April of this year, the project was concluded and the six technology holders undertook, in an exchange of diplomatic notes in Vienna, to permit the implementation of international safeguards based on the limited frequency unannounced access approach at their existing and planned commercial gas centrifuge uranium enrichment plant. Four of the project participants have gas centrifuge enrichment plants in operation or under construction. The operating plants include the two URENCO facilities at Almelo in the Netherlands and at Capenhurst in the United Kingdom, and the Japanese pilot plant at Ningyo Toge. In the United States, the Department of Energy's Gas Centrifuge Enrichment Plant, known as GCEP, is currently under construction, and is expected to begin recycle operations in the summer of 1984, with actual production for late summer of 1985.

We understand that the facility attachment negotiations for the Dutch and Japanese plants will be begun in the near future. The United Kingdom has listed its Capenhurst plant as eligible for IAEA safeguards under the U.K. voluntary offer, the IAEA has selected this plant for safeguards, and facility attachment negotiations are also expected to begin in the near future.

For our part, following the exchange of notes, we immediately took steps to place GCEP on the list of facilities eligible for safeguards under the U.S. voluntary offer, as required by our commitment in that offer to make available for safeguards all U.S. facilities deemed not to be of direct national security significance. Following notification to Congress, the IAEA was informed that GCEP was eligible for selection for safeguards, and the IAEA was invited to participate in a facility orientation visit to GCEP. At the end of July, the IAEA formally selected GCEP for safeguards, and the first IAEA inspection was conducted in early August, as the first small quantity of nuclear material was brought onto the site. The IAEA team responsible for negotiating facility attachments for all gas centrifuge enrichment plants was given a special orientation briefing and tour of the facility at this time. Once plant construction is sufficiently advanced, we will provide the appropriate design information to the IAEA and initiate facility attachment negotiations. We expect to provide the design information sometime around the first of next year.

To summarize then, all the HSP participants are currently engaged in the implementation of their respective undertakings, as made at the conclusion of the project. We fully expect that by the time that the facility attachment for GCEP is completed and enters into force, that the other parties will have completed similar arrangements with respect to their existing gas centrifuge enrichment plants.

Reestablishing Dialogue—Brazil and Argentina

A key element in our non-proliferation efforts has been to reestablish or strengthen a dialogue on nuclear cooperation and nonproliferation matters with states where such dialogue may have languished. This effort is perhaps best exemplified in the cases of Brazil and Argentina. For several years our relations with these two countries in the nuclear area were severely strained. The export of nuclear fuel and facilities to these countries had been prohibited by the NNPA unless full scope safeguards were adopted, and each country has indigenously developed nuclear facilities which have not been admitted to safeguards. Both countries have declined to sign the NPT, although both have signed, but not brought into force, the Treaty of Tlatelolco.

We have stressed to both Brazil and Argentina the importance of the NPT, the benefits of full adherence to IAEA safeguards, and we have urged both countries to waive into force the Treaty of Tlatelolco. We have urged both to strengthen their support for the IAEA and its safeguards programs. Meanwhile, we believe it important to carry on a dialogue on nuclear matters with those countries so that we can create a stronger sense of mutual confidence and an informed understanding of each other's nonproliferation concerns and objectives. In this respect, the administration is looking to limited nuclear cooperation in the area of nuclear safety and waste management, consistent with the Atomic Energy Act, while engaging these countries in renewed discussions regarding our nonproliferation goals.

Our discussions with Brazil have taken place under the aegis of the United States/Brazil Joint Working Group which was established jointly by President Reagan and President Figueiredo, following President Reagan's trip to Brazil last winter. The Working Group was tasked with exploring bilateral problem areas and exploring new opportunities for cooperation. Five subgroups were established, one of which dealt with nuclear matters.

Last May, I led a U.S. delegation for the first meeting of the nuclear subgroup in Brasilia. At that time we outlined potential areas of nuclear cooperation, and also had a full discussion of non-proliferation matters, including the importance of controls over nuclear exports and adherence to the Treaty of Tlatelolco. Significantly, the Brazilian side stressed that by virtue of signing the Treaty of Tlatelolco, Brazil considered itself legally and morally bound by its principles even though the Treaty was not yet in force.

The United States/Brazil nuclear subgroup met again in Washington in August and agreed to pursue a number of areas of nuclear cooperation, including nuclear safety, spent fuel and waste management, and reduced enrichment for research and test reactors. The meeting also afforded the opportunity to discuss President Reagan's initiatives on comprehensive safeguards and a series of non-proliferation and multilateral issues, including reducing politicization in the IAEA, the IAEA Committee on Assurances of Supply, and the prospects for an international plutonium storage regime (IPS). We also discussed the United States/Brazil enrichment services contract. We have been unable to complete our side of the contract in the existing circumstances because we cannot export the enriched product to Brazil given the limits of the Non-Proliferation Act. Accordingly, the United States and Brazil agreed that it would be in their mutual interest to suspend indefinitely the contract, as to which we had already suspended the first reload. We will continue discussions with Brazil concerning safeguards matters, and would hope that a situation could be developed which would permit reinstating the fuel supply contract. We believe that the working group meetings were highly successful and have led to a renewed spirit of cooperation between the United States and Brazil. For our part, we will be continuing these contacts, taking the opportunities to discuss with Brazil our nonproliferation concerns.

Argentina has presented a similar situation for many years. Our relations in the nuclear area have been strained and it has been difficult to find opportunities to pursue our nonproliferation objectives with the Government of Argentina. For this reason, the Administration is also working to regain a dialogue with Argentina—a dialogue which would encompass renewed discussion of our nonproliferation goals, while at the same time we seek areas where the United States and Argentina can cooperate, within the limits of our law.

During my trip to South America last May, I had extensive discussions with Admiral Castro Madero, the President of the Argentine Atomic Energy Commission. I stressed the importance of bringing into force the Treaty of Tlatelolco, the necessity of strengthening IAEA safeguards, the desirability of comprehensive safeguards, the need for emerging nuclear suppliers, such as Argentina, to follow agreed rules of nuclear trade, and the need to support and strengthen the IAEA. As in the case of Brazil, we discussed possible areas of nuclear cooperation between the United States and Argentina. Argentina has since followed up on our discussions and indicated an interest in pursuing cooperation in nuclear safety, waste management and spent fuel technical assistance, systems of accounting and control, reduced enrichment for research and test reactors, and laboratory-to-laboratory exchanges. Over the next few weeks, we will be examining these possibilities with a view to further talks during the IAEA General Conference in October.

Again, I believe that our initiative toward a dialogue is proving productive. Our discussions were frank and cordial and, while differences of view are evident, our talks have shown that there is a considerable measure of agreement on the need for common efforts to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons.

South Africa

South Africa is another country with which we are reestablishing a dialogue on non-proliferation matters. In the absence of South Africa's acceptance of full scope safeguards, the United States has not permitted the export of significant nuclear materials or equipment to South Africa since 1978. Unfortunately, over the same period our discussions with South Africa on nonproliferation matters had languished.

During the past year, we have revived our discussions with South Africa across a broad range of safeguards and nonproliferation matters, including adherence to comprehensive safeguards and the NPT, strengthening the IAEA safeguards regime, and requiring safeguards on all significant nuclear fuel and facilities placed in international commerce. We have also taken the opportunity to stress to the South Africans the benefits of placing their enrichment facilities under IAEA safeguards. At the same time, we have also discussed the possibility of resolving our differences on the existing uranium enrichment services contract between South Africa and the U.S. Department of Energy.

We believe that South Africa recognizes the importance of safeguards, as they might apply to their semi-commercial enrichment facility. We also believe that South Africa understands the importance of safeguards on international nuclear commerce. As these discussions continue, I plan to keep the Congress fully and currently informed on any developments which may occur.

International Atomic Energy Agency

Since I last testified before the Committee, a great deal has occurred in the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). As you are aware, we left last September's General Conference in protest against the illegal rejection of the credentials of the Israeli delegation. Since then, we have been pleased that our message to the IAEA membership seems to have been heard and heeded. Our extensive consultations with many members demonstrated that the great majority agreed with us on the need to reduce politicization in the IAEA. Following an extensive reassessment of U.S. participation in the IAEA, the President approved the resumption of U.S. participation and agreed that the IAEA safeguards system performs a critical role for U.S. national security, nonproliferation, and peaceful nuclear cooperation interests. Significantly, both the February and June meetings of the IAEA Board of Governors were businesslike and devoid of excess rhetoric or divisive dispute.

Thus, we are encouraged, Mr. Chairman, that the majority of the membership appears to agree that (1) the IAEA is a useful and worthwhile organization, (2) that extraneous political posturing and actions which threaten to destroy the IAEA are counterproductive, and (3) it is time to concentrate on the main objectives of the IAEA—to spread the benefits of peaceful nuclear technology under appropriate safeguards.

Nevertheless, I cannot claim that this year's General Conference will be totally free from problems. We will continue, however, to take strong measures to protect Israel's rights of membership in the IAEA to assert our view that the Agency must act in accord with the precepts of its statute and concentrate on its mandate to assure the benefits of the peaceful uses of nuclear energy with safeguards to guard against its misuse.

That concludes my formal statement, Mr. Chairman. I know that you and other Members of the Committees have a number of questions you wish to ask and I would be happy to respond to them at this time.

Statement by President Reagan, October 4, 1983 [72]

New Initiatives in START Talks

Ladies and gentlemen, later today Ambassador Ed Rowny and the other members of the START delegation will depart for Geneva for the opening of the fifth round [73] of the Strategic Arms Reduction Talks. They will carry with them a new set of instructions. From the first day of these negotiations our highest goal has been to achieve a stable balance at reduced levels of nuclear arsenals. We want to reduce the weapons of war, pure and simple.

All of our efforts in both the START and the INF negotiations continue to be guided by that objective. Just this morning I repeated this commitment to President Carstens of the Federal Republic of Germany.[74] As I pledged to the United Nations,[75] the United States will accept any equitable, verifiable agreement that stabilizes forces at lower levels than currently exist. We want significant reductions, and that pledge stands.

In the last round of negotiations we proposed a number of new initiatives which were in harmony with the recommendations of the Presidential Commission on Strategic Forces and which provided additional flexibility to our negotiations. Those initiatives supported our basic goals and they also responded to a number of Soviet concerns.

I deeply regret that the Soviet Union has yet to give any significant response. Throughout the negotiating process it's the United States who's had to push, pull, probe, and prod in an effort to achieve any progress. The heartfelt desire shared by people everywhere for an historic agreement dramatically reducing nuclear weapons could and, indeed, will be achieved, provided one condition changes; the Soviet Government must start negotiating in good faith.

And let me emphasize that the United States has gone the extra mile. We've removed the dividing line between the two phases of our original proposal; everything is on the table. We're still most concerned about limits on the fast-flying, most dangerous systems, but we're also prepared to negotiate limits on bomber and air-launch cruise missile limits below Salt II levels. We've shown great flexibility in dealing with the destructive capability of ballistic missiles, including their throw-weight.

We've also relaxed our limits on the number of ballistic missiles. We've gone a very long way to address Soviet concerns but the Soviets have yet to take their first meaningful step to address ours, particularly in the INF talks, but also in START they've been stonewalling our proposals. When we proposed confidence-building measures that could be agreed to right now, they said wait. Apparently they believe that time is on their side, that they can exploit one democracy against another, and that their uncompromising attitude and delay will ultimately win out.

Well, We'll prove them wrong. The diversity of our democracies is a source of strength, not weakness. From free discussion among free people comes unity and commitment. The sooner this is understood, the sooner we'll reach an agreement in the interests of both sides. We'll continue to press Moscow for an equitable, fair, and verifiable agreement.

When the START negotiations resume tomorrow, the United States delegation will again have sustained flexibility. Within the framework of the basic principles that have guided us throughout the negotiations, I am directing Ambassador Rowny to offer the following new initiatives. We're incorporating into START a series of build-down proposals. The United States will introduce a proposal for a mutual, guaranteed build-down designed to encourage stabilizing systems. The proposal will include specific provisions for building down ballistic warheads and, concurrently, for addressing a parallel build-down on bombers.

To discuss these major new initiatives, we will also propose the establishment of a U.S.-Soviet build-down working group in the Geneva talks. On another front, and in our effort, again, to be absolutely as flexible as possible, we will be willing to explore ways to further limit the size and capability of air-launch cruise missile forces in exchange for reciprocal Soviet flexibility on items of concern to us.

We seek limits on the destructive capability of missiles and recognize that the Soviet Union would seek limits on bombers in return. There will have to be trade offs and the United States is prepared to make them, so long as they result in a more stable balance of forces. The Soviet Union should not doubt the bipartisan support for our efforts.

During our review process I looked for ways to broaden America's bipartisan approach to our overall arms control effort. We've consulted with many members of the Congress and again with the commission headed by Brent Scowcroft. Their counsel has been invaluable and I want to thank them for their tireless efforts and helpful advice. A solid, national, bipartisan consensus sustained from year to year and from administration to administration is crucial if we are to keep America safe and secure and if we're to achieve successful arms reductions.

Therefore, I have decided to take a number of new steps. Among these are to designate a member of the Scowcroft Commission, James Woolsey, as a member-at-large to our START negotiations. These actions reflect America's democratic process at its best.

Ambassador Rowny, as you and your team depart for Geneva, you go with the certain knowledge that you're negotiating with the full support of the American people. Our bipartisan support is stronger than ever before and you carry with you fair, equitable proposals that are in the interest of both nations and all humankind.

It's fitting today to repeat what I said last week. The door to an agreement is open. All the world is waiting for the Soviet Union to walk through. Should the Soviet leadership decide to join us now in our good faith effort, the fifth round of these negotiations will be the one in which, finally, a breakthrough was made, and finally the world began to breathe a bit easier.

So, to the entire START delegation, Ambassador Rowny, good luck and Godspeed. (Applause)

Statement by the Representative in the First Committee of the U.N. General Assembly (Fields), November 1, 1983 [76]

U.S. Views Regarding Prohibition of Chemical Weapons

Mr. Chairman,[77] In his statement of October 25, the representative of the Soviet Union dealt with the issue of chemical weapons and a number of other topics.[78] Today I would like to put forward the views of the United States regarding prohibition of chemical weapons. I may return to the other topics at a later time.

First of all, let me say that we can agree with the Soviet representative that, in concentrating our efforts on reducing nuclear weapons, we should not disregard the danger stemming from chemical weapons and other weapons of mass destruction.

The use of chemical weapons has long been viewed with revulsion by the Government and people of the United States—and indeed by all civilized nations of the world. The fundamental objective of U.S. policy in this area is to ensure that chemical weapons are never used. The most effective way to achieve this objective would be through a complete, effective and verifiable prohibition of chemical weapons, including destruction of existing stockpiles and production facilities.

[76] Source: U.S. Mission to the United Nations Press Release USUN 113-(83). The press release is incorrectly dated October 1, 1983.

[77] The Chairman of the First Committee in the 38th Session of the U.N. General Assembly was Tom Eric Vraalsen of Norway.

[78] The text of the statement given by Soviet representative Petrovsky is in U.N. document A/C.1/38/PV.

Regrettably, for reasons I will develop later, such a prohibition has so far eluded us. Under these circumstances, we cannot ignore the fact that the Soviet Union possesses a formidable chemical weapons capability. Therefore, until an acceptable agreement is achieved, the United States must, unfortunately, possess a credible chemical weapons capability to maintain a stable balance and thereby deter a chemical attack.

The United States naturally must assess its needs in this field in the light of what has happened in years past. For a long period, the United States—in contrast to the Soviet Union—has refrained from steadily improving its chemical weapons capability. Since 1969, the United States has not produced a single chemical weapon. In fact, large quantities of these munitions have been destroyed. To our profound regret, the Soviet Union has not matched our unilateral action with similar restraint.

We therefore have no alternative but to take limited steps to modernize our chemical weapons capability. But we are continuing to exercise restraint. We will not seek to match the excessive stockpiles of the Soviet Union. Indeed, the U.S. stockpile will continue to decrease. We will not build a massive CW military organization on the Soviet model, nor do we plan to deploy additional stocks on the territory of other states. What we earnestly desire is the final elimination of these weapons once and for all.

The Soviet representative spoke as if the Soviet Union does not produce chemical weapons, does not store them in Eastern Europe or elsewhere outside its own territory and even as though the Soviet Union has no chemical weapons program at all. Does the Soviet representative believe that the secrecy which shrouds Soviet military programs enables him to persuade the world community that Soviet stockpiles are old, obsolete and deteriorated, and stored in caves in the deep interior of the Soviet Union?

Mr. Chairman, the Soviet representative chose to characterize the efforts of my government in seeking a chemical weapons ban as less than serious. He has even characterized the U.S.-sponsored workshop—on verification of destruction of chemical weapons stockpiles—as an "ostentatious" activity. In reference to our verification position, he has also accused us of setting up "artificial barriers" to progress and as "deliberately demanding unacceptable verification" to "cover our reluctance to eliminate chemical weapons."

These charges, Mr. Chairman, are patently untrue and the distinguished Soviet delegate should know that they are. He must certainly be aware of the serious effort put forth by the United States in negotiating a ban on chemical weapons in the Committee on Disarmament in its 1983 session. [79] The facts speak for themselves and no amount of misrepresentation or distortion can change them.

The U.S. commitment to the objective of a chemical weapons ban is a longstanding one. It has been affirmed at the highest level of the U.S. Government. Vice President Bush, when he spoke to the committee last February, urged accelerating the efforts toward the achievement of a complete, effective and verifiable ban on the development, production, stockpiling, and transfer of chemical weapons. Shortly thereafter, the United States introduced a comprehensive document containing our detailed views on the contents of such a chemical weapons ban. The document was welcomed in the CD as a major contribution to its work in this area.

To ensure that our views were understood we sought out various interested delegations to clarify our position and expand on the technical details. We followed these informal consultations with a more formal series of question and answer sessions. These sessions were also well received and appeared to be useful and productive.

Later we introduced a major paper focussing on the verification of stockpile destruction. The paper, which took into account specific concerns raised by the Soviet Union, was designed to facilitate resolution of key issues.

At the same time we brought in experts from the United States to extend the dialogue on our papers. Interested delegations participated in intensive discussions with our experts on all facets of our papers.

Realizing that there is no better demonstration of our approach to the verification of stockpile destruction than at the site itself, we invited our colleagues in the CD, together with representatives of observer states, to the United States chemical weapons destruction facility in Tooele, Utah.[80] Far from being an "ostentatious activity", as the Soviet representative alleges, the workshop is a serious effort to assist progress toward a prohibition of chemical weapons. It will provide an opportunity for a more detailed examination of the process of stockpile destruction and of possible procedures for monitoring compliance relevant to provisions in a CW ban. It is our hope that it will expedite the resolution of problems in the verification area by promoting clearer understanding of their technical dimensions and graphically to present workable solutions to them. We are gratified that more than thirty states have accepted our invitation.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, it has been inferred that we have engaged in discussions of "secondary technical details." Let me assure you that the technical details relating to verification are not secondary—they are primary. This is not a United States view, but a widely held opinion of a majority of our CD colleagues. Vague generalities, detours into meaningless abstractions, nor hollow artifices will solve these complex issues. Only realism, good faith efforts and determined political will can do the trick.

The Soviet Union maintains that the United States has hardened its position on verification. Mr. Chairman, in developing its position the United States cannot act in a vacuum. Thus, for example, as regards our attitude toward the Soviet proposal for voluntary inspections, we could not but take into account the total lack of cooperation by some states with the UN experts who, under a mandate from the General Assembly, investigated reports of chemical weapons in Southeast and Southwest Asia.[81]

The Soviet representative recalled the Warsaw Pact proposal for a regional prohibition on a so-called "chemical weapons free zone for Europe."[82] The problems with this approach were described by the F.R.G. representative to the CD in his February 1983 statement in that committee.[83] This proposal addresses only a part of the worldwide concern over these terrible weapons. In any event, if the proposed arrangement were to be effective, it would have to include verification measures very similar to those required for an adequately verifiable general prohibition of chemical weapons. In fact, such measures would have to deal with an additional problem, namely the ease and promptness with which a nearby state possessing chemical weapons could re-introduce them in the proposed zone. As to the Soviet proposal for freezing the production and deployment of chemical weapons, such a freeze would also require verification measures more complex and extensive than those needed for a complete prohibition of chemical weapons. In short, rather than being interim measures designed, as the Soviet representative maintained, to expedite negotiations on such a prohibition, these proposals would have precisely the opposite effect. Our efforts should continue to be devoted to our fundamental objective of achieving a complete prohibition of chemical weapons.

Mr. Chairman, reference was made to bilateral negotiations on banning chemical weapons conducted between the United States and the Soviet Union for 3 years, ending in the summer of 1980. We believe that all nations, large and small, have a stake in these negotiations. I think it is fair to say also, Mr. Chairman, that my government is convinced that a multilateral forum offers the best chance and hope for concluding a ban on chemical weapons at this time.

Mr. Chairman, we cite these items of concrete evidence of our efforts to achieve a chemical weapons ban, not to exaggerate our role in the negotiation or minimize the many contributions of other delegations, but to set the record straight and to challenge others to join in a constructive undertaking in the CD to produce a chemical weapons ban in which the world community can place its confidence and we can all rest in the knowledge that these odious weapons will never threaten people again.

We have sought to chart such a course in the negotiations. Our invitation to Tooele is intended to be an aid in navigating that course toward the port which we all are trying to reach. I wish not to engage in rhetoric but to challenge those who question our sincerity and determination to demonstrate their interest in the achievement of an effective and verifiable ban on chemical weapons by responsible behaviour and good faith efforts at the negotiating table. If that challenge is accepted we can surely reach the objective on which I hope, we all agree.

Address by the Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency (Adelman) Before the World Affairs Council, Los Angeles, November 17, 1983 [84]

Paradoxes, Problems, and Promise of Arms Control

It is a great pleasure to be here with all of you today. I want to thank Ed Haddad and the Los Angeles World Affairs Council for this welcome opportunity to discuss one of—if not the—most intellectually challenging, emotionally gripping, and profoundly important issues of our era: How to control arms and reduce the risk of war.

It is a matter of survival, and also of how we make a better, safer world wherein freedom and justice flourish. It is, in an era of nuclear weaponry, a matter of global dimensions. And it is, I can assure you, an area that deeply and personally involves the President. It receives the highest priority of all of us serving under his leadership.

In a few days, many television viewers across the land will witness a powerful, draining portrayal of the horrors of nuclear war and its aftermath. The movie is, as you probably know, "The Day After". [85] Believe me, it is moving. Recently, scientific panels also have reminded us that nuclear war would have horrible and far-reaching consequences that would, by no means, be limited to the participants or to their hemisphere.

The thought of a "nuclear winter nightmare", the drama of the destruction of a typical American city—such as Lawrence, Kansas—and of society as we know and cherish it, are piercing reminders of the need to do everything possible to eliminate the chances of nuclear war from ever occurring. As President Reagan has said on several occasions: "A nuclear war cannot be won and must never be fought." And, "There are no winners in a nuclear war—only losers."

Avoiding war while preserving freedom is by no means easy. It is, in fact, a tough business. It requires not just defense efforts but an array of diplomatic relationships, and security, cultural, and economic ties with other countries. It often entails hard choices with each one having risks and costs. It requires—perhaps above all else—our mightiest moral, intellectual, and emotional resources.

The dramatizations of these weeks depict the horrors. They show the problem, but not the solution. Given the overwhelming—indeed, unimaginable—tragedy if we fail, and the heavy demands made on us to succeed—as we must—it is only natural that simple formulas gain popularity. The ideas of a "freeze" on nuclear weapons or unilateral nuclear disarmament are, in this respect, understandable.

But these ideas are deceptively alluring. As H. L. Mencken said, "There is always an easy solution to every human problem—neat, plausible, and wrong." Contrary to appearances, a freeze or unilateral disarmament will not help achieve greater stability or reduce the chances of war. They run a high risk, in fact, of inviting just the opposite results.

The paradoxes of arms control are glaring, often to the confusion of many concerned citizens. History has taught us that we must be prepared for war in order to avoid it. Strength can and does deter aggression. Weakness may invite it, and thus weakness is provocative.

Nuclear balance is essential to keep the peace. Deterrence means that a potential aggressor realizes that the costs to him will be unacceptably high. To pose that prospect, we must have forces and be seen as able and prepared, if necessary, to use those forces against key elements of Soviet power. Deterrence hinges upon the Soviet leaders' views of our capabilities and of our will. Deterrence may be difficult to comprehend and somewhat abstract, but it works. It has, for example, kept the peace in Europe for 38 years.

Another paradox is that a strong U.S. defense posture is necessary, not just for deterrence, but also for effective arms control. The Soviets are not unlike any tough negotiator. If they can realize their goals without giving up anything in return, they will surely prefer that deal. If we grant them strategic superiority by neglecting our force modernization, we cannot hope to regain strategic parity by pursuing arms control ever so diligently. On the other hand, if we pursue programs to redress the imbalances that have developed through the unparalleled Soviet military buildup, the Soviets will have strong incentives to negotiate for genuine arms reductions.

Our actions cannot, of course, guarantee that the Soviets will agree to substantial reductions in U.S. and Soviet nuclear arsenals. We might fail if we try. But we will surely fail if we don't try. No effective arms control will come about if we do not pursue deep reductions and needed defense programs. Weakness not only diminishes deterrence but also undercuts arms control.

A number of problems, as you can imagine, arise between the paradox and the promise of arms control. These problems include (1) the unabated Soviet buildup of military forces; (2) asymmetries between the two sides' force structures; and (3) American impatience.

Both effective deterrence and real arms control have become tougher to achieve because of Soviet conduct, and the Soviet weapons buildup over the past decade. Since 1972, the Soviet Union has tripled its number of strategic nuclear weapons. The Soviets dedicate at least 12–14 percent of their gross national product to defense, or basically double what the United States spends on defense relative to its GNP.

The Soviets have kept production lines open and active for all three legs of the strategic triad—land-based missiles, submarine-based missiles, and bombers—whereas the United States had an open production line only for submarines when President Reagan took office. The Soviets have also steadily increased their intermediate-range, land-based nuclear forces targeted on Western Europe and Asia, having for years a monopoly on these weapons.

The United States has no interest in an arms race with the Soviet Union. In fact we have not been racing at all. Our increase in strategic weaponry has been at a much slower pace. The destructive capability of our strategic weapons is today 60 percent less than that of the Soviets. Looking at our total nuclear stockpile, the number of U.S. nuclear weapons is at its lowest level in 20 years and the megatonnage of our nuclear weapons today is only a quarter of what it was in the late 1960's. In more graphic terms, we have deployed today some 8,000 fewer nuclear weapons than in the 1960's.

As President Reagan noted in his radio address last month,[86] Western restraint stands in stark contrast to the Soviet buildup in intermediate-range nuclear forces. The Soviets began in the mid-1970's to increase these forces targeted on our allies in Europe and Asia with a new, triple-warheaded, more accurate missile—the SS–20. They have continued to deploy these mobile missiles. They now have 360 SS-20's with 1,080 warheads.

For its part, the United States has withdrawn 1,000 nuclear weapons from Europe since 1980, and has just this month announced that another 1,400 will be withdrawn. [87] For each new nuclear weapon that may be deployed in Europe over the coming times pursuant to NATO's 1979 decision, more than five nuclear weapons will have been withdrawn from Europe.

This is as it should be. We should tolerate only the bare minimum number of nuclear weapons necessary for effective deterrence. Moreover, together with our allies, we are dedicating ourselves toward less reliance on nuclear weapons, and more on new conventional methods for preserving our freedom. This, too, is as it should be.

The President has taken major initiatives to try to eliminate this intermediate-range class of weapons entirely—our zero-zero solution. Since the Soviets have continued to refuse to do that, the President has taken other initiatives to reduce these weapons to the lowest possible equal level.

His efforts—in the INF talks in Geneva—have regrettably met with Soviet stonewalling. We are faced this week with the prospect that the Soviets may not negotiate if U.S. deployments go forward, as NATO has planned since 1979, to balance this Soviet military threat. A Soviet walkout would be ironic and unjustified. We have negotiated for several years while the Soviets steadily deployed new weapons, on an average of one new SS-20 a week. Since negotiations began, the Soviet Union has fielded over 100 additional SS-20 systems with some 300 warheads.

Now that U.S. deployments are starting according to the schedule established 4 years ago, [88] the Soviets threaten to walk out unless we agree to give them a monopoly on these missiles. All their proposals have had the same bottom line: hundreds of these missiles for them and zero for us.

If the Soviets were serious about an agreement, they would stay at the table and negotiate. The United States will negotiate as long as necessary to reach a sound settlement. We are also prepared at any time to modify or reverse our missile deployments if such a settlement is achieved.

Pressure tactics are, of course, standard Soviet methods. In 1979, the Soviet Union said that there could be no negotiations if NATO decided to deploy these missiles. Nine months later they agreed to talks after NATO showed its determination. In 1982, the Soviets threatened to suspend negotiations if NATO moved forward with preparations for deployment. These preparations have gone forward and the talks have continued.

We do not know exactly what the Soviets have in mind now. But we do know that we should not be surprised by their pressure tactics. Nor should we be cowed or intimidated. Staying the course we are on provides the only opportunity for a balance or reduction of these weapons that will enhance stability and reduce the risk of war.

Another problem for arms control relates to the broader context of Soviet conduct around the world. Arms control cannot be immune from major outside forces, and it has not been. President Johnson's plans for a Moscow visit to launch the first strategic arms limitation talks were dashed by the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968. Discovery of the Soviet brigade in Cuba in the fall of 1979, plus the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan at the end of 1979, adversely affected Senate consideration of the SALT II Treaty signed in June of that year.

The Reagan administration does not seek to link arms control efforts to other areas of Soviet behavior. In the wake of the tragedy of the Korean commercial airliner shot down by the Soviets, for example, the President did not suspend the arms talks. On the contrary, he continued to review problems in the negotiations and to undertake steps to overcome them.

But Soviet behavior can and at times will impact on our arms control efforts, like it or not. This is inevitable in a democracy, where neither the public nor its representatives can place aspects of Soviet conduct in totally separate boxes. Soviet adherence to existing arms control treaties or to pledges on their part also raises perplexing problems.

It is particularly tragic that the use of chemical warfare in Asia continues today in violation of international agreements, international law and civilized behavior. These actions by the Soviet Union or its allies have accounted for an estimated 10,000 deaths among the Afghan hill peoples and Asian peasants. This assaults everyone's sense of human decency. Other Soviet actions raise serious questions about their compliance with the ABM Treaty and with their political undertakings related to the SALT II Treaty.

We cannot turn our back on evidence of such violations. If we are serious about arms control, we must be equally serious about problems of compliance. The Reagan administration is comprehensively reviewing these issues and we continue to raise them with the Soviets at high levels.

Another major problem in nuclear arms control stems from the two sides' different force structures and approaches. The United States has, for example, over time leaned toward smaller missiles with improved accuracy and technology, and toward a balance between the three legs of the strategic triad. The Soviets, on the other hand, have placed greater emphasis on destablizing heavier, land-based missiles.

Differences of perspective resulting from geography, from history, and from tradition further compound the difficulties of negotiation between the United States and the Soviet Union. The Soviets see any weapons targeted on the USSR as "strategic", whereas we differ on that definition since some of our weapons in Europe are there only to offset Soviet weapons targeted on our allies in Europe.

Differences lie also in that the Soviets seek forces that far outnumber all their potential adversaries combined. But, were we to agree with that formulation, the Soviet Union would be far stronger than any single potential adversary, such as the United States. Granting the Soviet Union superiority by arms control is obviously unacceptable.

Simply put, the two sides' forces are not comparable in many respects. Thus, even with good faith and major efforts by both sides, it is difficult intellectually to bridge the wide gaps.

But that is precisely the challenge of negotiations, and—I can assure you—one of the things that makes my job and others so extraordinarily stimulating. How to balance systems that are comparable and to make tradeoffs between systems that are not is easier said than done, but still possible.

Last month President Reagan made clear that the United States is prepared in the strategic arms reduction talks to negotiate tradeoffs between Soviet advantages and U.S. advantages.[89] He also called for a mutual, guaranteed build-down of ballistic missile warheads and bomber platforms. This would reduce the number of missile warheads by a third on both sides, an approach which offers a promising beginning if the Soviets are willing.

A third problem—besides the Soviet military buildup and asymmetries between the U.S. and Soviet forces—is uniquely ours: it is traditional American impatience. This, of course, has many beneficial and noble aspects. We are an active people. We see problems and we want to solve them—sooner rather than later. Our creativity and problem-solving impulse have built the kind of society which we are so fortunate and justifiably proud to have today.

But effective arms control, like most worthwhile endeavors, does not come quickly. The key issues we face today are extremely complicated, as you might have discerned from my remarks above. progress will be more difficult than in the past and, needless to say, it was not particularly easy then. Achieving militarily significant reductions and sound limitations promises to be a long, hard road.

We cannot be discouraged by the difficulty of the passage. As we travel down this road, we should be wary of the lure of agreements which may look appealing but, on reflection, do not really serve the goals for which they are intended. We should be wary of any so-called simple solutions and should not allow sweeping, unverifiable declarations of intent to be confused with real arms control.

Empty agreements would be easy and quick. We could have one tomorrow. But they would inflate expectations without offering much in the way of concrete benefit.

Effective arms control will, thus, take considerable time and patience. Negotiation of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, for example, took some 5 years. Other agreements have required even more time. The Austrian State Treaty took more than 10 years to negotiate and conclude. Would we have a free and independent Austria today if the West had, at any stage, given up or compromised its basic principles and objectives? There is, I am sorry to report, no quick and easy route to a better world.

Under President Reagan, the United States has been embarked on one of the most ambitious arms control agendas ever developed. That fact is often insufficiently understood and sometimes badly misrepresented.

I do not plan to bore you with all the intricate details of our negotiations. A summary review of our major efforts clearly illustrates just how broad the current arms control agenda is.

In the strategic arms reductions talks in Geneva we seek deep reductions in strategic nuclear weapons. We should not be satisfied with merely capping nuclear arms at high levels. Since SALT I and SALT II we have seen substantial increases in the Soviet nuclear forces that have created strategic imbalances. Arms control needs to do better.

In the talks on intermediate-range, land-based nuclear forces in Geneva we continue to seek the complete elimination of these weapons, but are willing to accept any agreement that would substantially and effectively reduce the systems to equal and low U.S. and Soviet levels on a global basis.

While we push ahead to reduce existing nuclear arsenals, we also continue vigorous efforts to prevent the further spread of nuclear weapons. It is imperative that the spread of nuclear weapons around the world be halted.

In the Committee on Disarmament in Geneva we are actively engaged in trying to rid the world of all chemical weapons. As expressed by one keen observer, these weapons have all the potential for becoming "the poor countries' weapons of mass destruction." The world cannot afford that, and we are redoubling our efforts to work out a complete and effective ban on all chemical weapons.

I personally feel strongly about this important area. The moral, legal, and political barriers that have been built up over the decades on chemical weapons use are in danger of being eroded, and of tumbling down. We need to buttress and build on them; just as we have done in preventing the spread of nuclear weapons.

In the mutual and balanced force reductions talks we have, with our allies, taken initiatives to seek reductions in conventional forces in Europe.

In the upcoming Conference on Confidence and Security Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe, we are again working with our allies to achieve agreements that will reduce the risk of war arising through error or miscalculation.

Despite this impressive agenda, some critics argue that the Reagan administration is not serious about arms control. Nothing could be further from the truth, as you can see.

Another line of criticism is, ironically, that the President's arms control proposals are too ambitious. I am not entirely sure what such criticisms mean. Should we not seek deep and militarily significant reductions in strategic nuclear weapons? Should we not ensure that reductions are balanced in a way that contributes to, rather than detracts from, stability? Should we not seek much lower levels of nuclear weapons and conventional forces in Europe? Should we not seek to prevent the further spread of nuclear weapons and to ban all chemical weapons?

These goals are surely ambitious. But can we afford to be anything less? I do not think so. The President does not think so. And I doubt that the American people think so.

The promise of arms control is frequently exaggerated by some and underestimated by others. It cannot, by itself, resolve the world's problems. We should not burden it with the task of resolving the major political and ideological differences that separate free people from the Soviet Union—particularly its repression at home and aggression abroad. Arms control cannot and was not meant to carry such a load.

But arms control can make a key contribution. It holds out a promise of a world with fewer and fewer nuclear weapons, with less and less overall destructive capability; a promise of greater stability and reductions in the chances of war by error or miscalculation in crises; and a promise of a better basis for security planning. When all is said and done, it can be one of the foundations for the better world that we all seek.

Arms control, in general terms, represents the embodiment of hope among peoples for a world spared from the kind and intensity of conflict that so deeply marred the first half of this century. These vital efforts deserve everyone's support. As President Reagan and the other summit partners noted earlier this year in Williamsburg, arms control is part of "a vision of a world in which the shadow of war has been lifted from all mankind."

MR. SPEAKES. START; the Soviets this morning—we ended the talks at the time—at their scheduled ending for the traditional January—December-January recess. The Soviets did not set a date for the resumption. [91] Ambassador Rowny has issued a statement. Our viewpoint, of course, is identical to his that we do not agree that the Soviets should fail to set a resumption date for the talks, based on issues outside of the talks. We think the United States has made a concerted effort to reach an agreement on strategic weapons with the Soviets. We are prepared to continue our discussions. We think there is a basis for agreement, there is a possibility of agreement. We would like to resume as scheduled in February in the hope that the Soviets can get—will agree to a resumption date in February. We believe it is of paramount interest that—to the entire world that these talks continue, and we will do everything we can to see that they do.

Q. Like what?

MR. SPEAKES. Continue to try to encourage the Soviets to—

Q. How?

MR. SPEAKES. —set a date. How? By diplomatic discussions.

Q. Is there a chance of merging the two talks, the mid-range and the long—

MR. SPEAKES. Basically, we would prefer that not be the route. We think that—

Q. Has that been considered, though, or talked over?

MR. SPEAKES. I don't think so. Not actively.

Q. Is it the perception of the U.S. negotiators that the Soviets do not intend to come back?

MR. SPEAKES. I don't think we can read that yet. . . . I don't think we can—we have enough—we just can't say what their intentions are. We don't know what their intentions are.

Q. Were we surprised? I mean, we've been saying—they've been saying they were going to do this; we've been saying we didn't think they were going to do this, so what was the expectation?

MR. SPEAKES. Well, I always hesitate to answer to "Were you surprised?" questions. Not a very precise question. The point is that we—they said what they said and we like for them to set a date.

Q. We propose a date and see if they accept it?

MR. SPEAKES. We are hoping that—we have proposed a February date—or a date in February. Time, presumption time is February. I don't know whether it's a precise date, or not.

Q. Larry, have the Soviets indicated flatly they will not come back or have they indicated that they just will not set a date?

MR. SPEAKES. That's—their statement indicates that they would not—TASS says, "The date for resumption of talks has not been set due to this." This, meaning the deployment.

Q. Has the President made any effort to contact Mr. Andropov over this issue?

MR. SPEAKES. Not that I'm aware of . . . .

Q. You say in your statement you think there's a basis for an agreement. Can you elaborate on that?

MR. SPEAKES. Yes. The basis for an agreement is the fact that we have proposed to reduce the nuclear weapons of both nations by one-third on each side to a level of 5,000. We've also proposed to reduce heavy bombers and air launch cruise missiles well below the SALT II levels. We think this could be accomplished by a build-down that encourages stability and we demonstrated great flexibility repeatedly in these talks by modifying our positions to take into account the concerns of the Soviets.

Q. But basically, the basis is, in fact, our proposal and isn't as if, somewhere along the line, there is a serious nibbling by the Soviets.

MR. SPEAKES. No. I think the basis is our proposal, yes.

. . . . . .

Q. How about the concern? Has this raised the level of concern over a possible nuclear conflict?

Mr. Speakes. No, I don't think so. I don't think this, in any way, raises that possibility. I think it's important, though, that we continue to negotiate to reduce weapons and that's what we've tried in both START and INF.

Q. Is this the first time that they have linked START talks to the deployment in Europe? In the past it's always been INF.

Mr. Speakes. I believe so, unless they did privately . . . within the talks. It's the first public statement I recall.

Q. Is there any feeling that the Soviets have now just put everything on hold to ride out the election?

Mr. Speakes. . . . I don't know. I can't say that. I don't know what their plans are.

. . . . . .

Q. On the START matter, it looks like the Russians are really determined to try some way or another to stop the deployment of the Pershings. Is there any possibility that these will be slowed down?

MR. SPEAKES. No. Going ahead on schedule.

Q. —ahead on schedule—

MR. SPEAKES. Going ahead on schedule.

Q. —regardless?

MR. SPEAKES. Yes. That's—

Q. What's our position about possibly considering merging the talks?

MR. SPEAKES. . . . generally we oppose this idea. We'll consider it, but I think—

Q. We will consider it?

MR. SIMS. We think it would complicate the talks.

MR. SPEAKES. Yes. We have considered it, I guess is a better way to put it. But I think Shultz and the disarmament people have said it's not the way to go.

Q. But if it were the only way to get the Soviets back to both negotiations.

MR. SPEAKES. It's hypothetical at the moment.

Q. Do we plan to continue to abide by the nonratified SALT II agreement?

MR. SPEAKES. Yes.

Q. And do we plan to make public alleged Soviet violations of START?

MR. SPEAKES. We've, in the past, have made some violations of various treaties public, but I don't know. We still have a number of alleged violations under study in an interagency group. [92] Whether we'll make that public hasn't been decided.

Q. There have been reports in I don't know how many newspapers that the report is ready and it's going to Congress very shortly.

MR. SPEAKES. Yes. I don't know. Bob, do you—

MR. SIMS. That's—those reports are not correct.

Q. Excuse me?

MR. SIMS. Those reports are not correct if they're as you state them because there still is study within the interagency group. No Presidential decision that I'm aware of and we have some requests from Congress to provide reports and I'm sure we'll comply with those requests.

Q. The Senate voted 93 to nothing to request it, didn't they? [93]

MR. SIMS. Yes. We've indicated that we would reply, yes. There's nothing on timing, no decision.

Q. You would comply with the congressional request with the report as it has been reported in the press, the report with those particular violations, or you would comply with some different form of report?

MR. SIMS. That's not decided.

Q. Are you saying, Bob, that it's just not decided whether you're going to report to Congress at all or are you still trying to decide whether there have been 200 or so violations?

MR. SIMS. We would undoubtedly be reporting to Congress. But the work preparatory to making a report is not completed and there's no decision.

Q. Is there any doubt at all that there were numerous violations?

MR. SIMS. We'll wait until we complete the work.

Q. You're saying there's no decision on what will be included in that report?

MR. SIMS. This work isn't completed on the interagency review, which McFarlane chairs, of Soviet arms compliance—arms control treaty compliance.

Q. And you're telling us the substance of that report is not as it's been written in the various reports?

MR. SIMS. I just wouldn't want to comment on the reports published about what we might or might not report.

Address by the Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency (Adelman) Before the Arms Control Association, December 8, 1983 (Extract) [94]

"The Principle of Reasonable Trade-Offs That Enhance Stability Should Be Our Guide"

. . . . . .

I would like today to suggest a few key elements and objectives that could serve us well over the long haul in the area of strategic nuclear arms limitations.

First, arms control approaches should provide incentives for moving toward more stabilizing systems and disincentives for increasing or retaining destabilizing systems. The administration has been criticized for making reductions in the large, MIRVed ICBM warheads a centerpiece of our START proposal. We are indeed working hard for reductions in these systems. But it is unfair criticism to the extent that it suggests either that we need not be so concerned about such systems or that we are unwilling to make the necessary trade-offs to achieve reductions in them.

The Soviets' emphasis on large, MIRVed ICBM systems with increased accuracy presents a potential first-strike threat—and an advantage in destructive capability. This undermines deterrence and runs contrary to our interest in overall strategic stability. Thus, for reasons of stability and deterrence, we need to do something about these systems. The President's Commission on Strategic Forces, headed by Brent Scowcroft, reminded us of this fact and of the importance of structuring our arms control proposals and defense programs to encourage more stabilizing systems.

The Soviets may or may not be willing to move away from their heavy MIRVed systems over time. It is too early to tell. But their advantage in this area will persist for some time. It seems evident that we should encourage them to move away from such destabilizing systems. The Soviets are, I suggest, much more likely to move in certain directions if we advance incentives for doing so than if we do not.

A second and related element is the need to reduce the great disparity in destructive capability between U.S. and Soviet missile forces. Throwweight is a key measure of that capability. Today, the Soviets have almost 12 million pounds of throwweight compared to about 4 1/2 million pounds for the United States. Accuracy is also a critical element in measuring hard-target kill capability, and traditionally we had some edge in accuracy. But that edge has all but disappeared as Soviet accuracy has advanced.

We dare not make too little of throwweight. If we want to move toward smaller, less vulnerable systems—as the Scowcroft Commission and we in the administration urge—we will need to lower the throwweight discrepancy between the Soviets and the United States. To allow one side many more times the destructive capability than the other would inhibit the move toward a more stable balance with smaller, less vulnerable systems. That great disparity can give one side advantages in both hard-target kill capability and the capability for barrage attacks on mobile and other systems, not to mention a large breakout potential.

No matter how you cut it, the existing disparity in throwweight is destabilizing. It will continue to be unless we can reduce it. We need to get on a track that will diminish these differences. Our arms control approaches can and should help get us there.

A third basic element is that an equitable agreement will need to include balanced trade-offs between different systems. Substantial differences between U.S. and Soviet history, tradition, and alliance relationships are reflected in very different force structures that pose real obstacles to achieving sound agreements. Historically, for example, we have leaned more toward an equal balance among the three legs of the strategic triad and toward smaller missiles with improved accuracy and technology than have the Soviets. The Soviets, in contrast, have opted more for big systems and for keeping a preponderant portion of their strategic forces on land. Each side's START proposals have largely addressed what it perceives to be the major problems in the current strategic balance.

The real negotiating issue, of course, is how to trade-off between different categories of weapons, or how to permit one side advantages in an area that will be offset by the other side's advantages in another area. President Reagan has clearly stated that the United States is prepared to make trade-offs between the two sides' systems in ways that will contribute to stability.

Sound trade-offs are much easier said than done since strategic systems are not readily commensurate. If they were, the negotiations and bureaucratic tasks would be far less demanding than they are in real life. As it is, however, we should not slide over the well-known distinction between ballistic missiles on the one hand and bombers and bomber weapons on the other. These missiles give little warning time, present a first-strike threat, and are difficult to defend against. Bombers are much slower, recallable prior to weapons delivery and, in the case of U.S. bombers, have to penetrate formidable Soviet air defenses.

It is, in my view, essential to recognize the real differences between these systems, and to treat them accordingly in our arms control approaches. This might be done, for example, by separate ceilings or by permitting a hierarchy of different ceilings, with some limited freedom to mix between categories. There may be other approaches as well. But the principle of reasonable trade-offs that enhance stability should be our guide.

Finally, I would return to my first assumption that our arms control approaches should be designed to endure. I am quite familiar with the complaints that the Reagan administration was too slow in getting its arms control proposals together and really does not seek an agreement. These complaints underestimate the need for careful review and undervalue the far-reaching arms control proposals put forth by President Reagan.

The President had good reason not to rush into new positions and negotiations. The experience of the Carter administration's dramatic early push—followed by an even quicker falling off—was one not to be repeated. The Reagan administration took some time to evolve solid proposals based on principles that would stand up over time. The criticism that the length of these preparations and the resulting positions reflect a disinclination to engage seriously in arms control is way off the mark. The positions actually reflect the kinds of principles that I have discussed earlier and which, I submit, can provide the basis for a long-term agreement that would enhance stability at lower force levels.

The fact is that President Reagan is embarked on one of the most ambitious arms control agendas developed by any administration. He has advanced proposals to reduce strategic missile warheads by a third. Working closely with Congress, his most recent initiative would establish a schedule and mechanism for a mutual, guaranteed build-down in missile warheads and bombers. While still preferring the complete elimination of longer-range, land-based INF missiles, he has made clear a willingness to accept equal global levels at lower numbers than the Soviets have amassed to date. In MBFR, we have advanced proposals to reduce conventional forces in Europe; in the Committee on Disarmament, we have sought to ban chemical weapons altogether.

The President's arms control agenda includes a number of confidence building proposals to reduce further the risk of miscalculation in a crisis or accidental war. These, like our other efforts, are critical in the age of nuclear weaponry. The Conference on Disarmament in Europe opens this January, and we have been preparing to work for agreements to reduce the chances of suprise attack in Europe.

Some people say that this agenda is too ambitious. The President believes that we must be ambitious if we are to achieve agreements that will significantly reduce arms and enhance stability. I share that view, and believe most Americans do as well.

There is also the related criticism that the administration's emphasis on defense modernization is another sign that arms control is being short shrifted. This view, again, is off the mark.

The MX, Trident, Pershing II, and GLCM—for example—have been in the works for several years as part of the U.S. effort to counter the Soviet buildup. Indeed, in the case of the MX, we today see a program one-half the size in numbers and far simpler in deployment mode than what was proposed under the previous administration. Many factors account for this, but the point still sticks: These efforts do not signal that arms control is being downgraded or deemphasized.

Strong defense efforts are necessary not just for deterrence but also for effective arms control. The Soviets are like any tough negotiator, as some of you here know full well. If the Soviets can realize their goals without giving up anything in return, they will surely prefer that deal. If we grant them significant strategic advantages by neglecting our own defenses, we cannot hope to solve that problem through arms control alone—no matter how diligent and creative we are in our approaches.

On the other hand, our modernization programs to redress today's and tomorrow's strategic imbalances can help move the Soviets toward serious negotiations. The Reagan administration's program for strengthening our defense posture is consistent with—indeed, necessary for—a strong and active arms control effort.

Treaties designed for the long-haul can be achieved. Take, for example, the ABM treaty which dealt with an entire class of weapons for an indefinite duration. We have a lot to learn from that effort and from the individual who negotiated it—Gerry Smith.

But even long-term treaties need constant attention. The Soviet construction of a new radar, for example, has raised serious concerns about their compliance with the ABM treaty. Other activities cast a pall of doubt over their political undertakings related to SALT II. The use of chemical warfare in Asia—in violation of longstanding international agreements and law—is particularly appalling.

We cannot—and will not—ignore these problems. If we are serious about arms control, we must be serious about compliance with arms control commitments and about effective verification for arms control proposals. As the President has stated, we are deeply concerned about Soviet activities in a number of compliance areas. We are completing a comprehensive review for the President and the Congress, and are continuing to raise these issues with the Soviets.

I know that some of you are worried about the implications of U.S. ballistic missile defense programs for the ABM treaty. All the options recently presented for the President's consideration involve only research—not deployment—and only activities consistent with our international treaty obligations, including the ABM treaty. The President has made this intention clear from the outset.

If, in the coming decades, deployment were deemed desirable, obviously there would be a need for some modifications of the ABM treaty. That factor will need to be weighed if and when we get to that point. The President has also made clear that we would work with the Soviet Union on this matter.

At this stage it is not possible to predict if or when we might need to pursue such action. But we do know that the Soviets have an extensive program and a future breakout potential in these areas. In this light, it is only prudent for us to pursue an active research program as a hedge or safeguard, and consistent with all our obligations.

I have, this afternoon, focused on strategic arms issues and have not addressed a number of other critical areas—such as INF and nuclear nonproliferation. I wish we had time to discuss our efforts in these areas as well.

The potential spread of nuclear weapons to additional countries presents, as you know, one of the greatest threats to world peace and stability. That problem occupies and concerns me personally as much as any other issue. I can assure you that we in ACDA are doing our part to ensure that we have a vigorous and vigilant program to prevent proliferation through such measures as strengthening supplier controls and international safeguards.

I have also deliberately avoided an account of where we stand in our various arms control negotiations, but look forward to answering any questions on these matters. You are no doubt well aware that considerable movement must yet be made if we are to achieve agreement on significantly reducing nuclear weapons.

But effective arms control, like most worthwhile endeavors, does not come quickly. The key issues we face today are extremely complicated. Progress will likely be more difficult today than in the past. Needless to say, it was not particularly easy then. Achieving reductions, a significant build-down of weapons, promises to be a hard and long road.

It also promises to be a road filled with Soviet pressure tactics and turns. These are part and parcel of Soviet bargaining. Like other tough negotiators, the Soviets will stake out and push hard on certain positions, reconsidering them later if the other side perseveres. In the late 1960's, for example, the Soviets insisted that ABM's were not a subject for arms control. Later, when it became clear that the United States was going forward with its programs, the Soviets entered into negotiations and eventually an ABM agreement.

In more recent years, the Soviets have taken strong stands concerning negotiations on INF systems. Prior to NATO's December 1979 decision, they said that negotiations would be impossible. Talks began 9 months later. It is too early to tell what will happen with the Soviet's present position that further INF talks are impossible unless U.S. systems are withdrawn. I hope that position will change as well.

Prior to the recent Soviet walkout, both sides had moved some in those negotiations. Unfortunately, all the Soviet moves were in the context of their "half-zero option"—zero U.S. INF systems for NATO and over 700 warheads for the Soviet side. That part of their proposal never changed. It was the stumbling block for an agreement.

But we should not be disheartened by the difficulty of the moment. As Samuel Johnson said, "Where there is no hope, there can be no endeavor." If we can achieve a lasting consensus on the kinds of principles discussed here, and if we persevere, I believe there is hope for arms control to make a greater contribution to international security and stability than ever. The Reagan administration and we in ACDA will endeavor to make that happen. The American people—indeed, the world at large—deserve nothing less than a steady, determined effort to reduce arms and the risk of war.

Chapter 5. Foreign Economic Policy

A. General Policy Issues

Document 52

Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, February 15, 1983 [1]

Restoring Prosperity to the World Economy

Mr. Chairman and distinguished members of this committee, I am very pleased to have a chance to respond to your invitation to testify on the international economic system and the ramifications of it for the United States. So my testimony, responsive to your invitation and the questions, is focused on this subject.

I would like to say at the outset, however, that you should not infer from that that I think this is the only subject of interest in foreign policy matters, and in particular, I would like to say that the general program of security assistance and economic assistance is of great importance to us in our foreign policy.

I am delighted to learn that you are going to push ahead rapidly on your markup in this area, and I know that Under Secretary Schneider is due to testify, I think, on Thursday. [2] I simply want to lend my support to what he will be telling you.

Restoring prosperity and stability in the world economy is one of the fundamental goals of the President's foreign policy. Progress toward that goal reinforces our other fundamental objectives—safeguarding peace and security and expanding the benefits of democracy and freedom.

I am going to divide my remarks on the international economic system into three sections. First, a discussion of the U.S. stake in the international economy—where do we come in. Second, an examination of the antecedents of the current situation and the challenges that it presents; and finally, a description of some of the actions that the administration is taking and my thoughts about them, to re-invigorate the world economy.

This country began as a trading nation. The legend of the Yankee Trader has faded with time, but no matter how remote the image, there are still plenty of Yankee traders among us, and I think partly as a result, foreign trade is now more important than ever to the vitality of our country.

In 1981, the United States represented about 25 percent of the world gross national product. One out of five U.S. jobs depends in some way on trade, and 40 percent of our cropland is devoted to production for exports.

In the last decade, U.S. merchandise exports, as a percent of our GNP, have doubled from 4 percent to over 8 percent. Much of this increase is attributable to the growing interdependence of the world's market economies in the 1970's.

Non-OPEC—leave the oil out of it—non-OPEC developing nations, for example, accounted for roughly 20 percent of U.S. exports in 1970. The same nations now account for nearly 30 percent of U.S. exports, which happens to be more than either the European Community or Japan.

On the other side of the trade ledger, the non-OPEC developing countries supply about 25 percent of the goods we import for use by our factories and consumers. Since the counterpart to interdependence is dependence, it is not surprising that the Third World supplies more than half the bauxite, tin, and cobalt used in American industry, and virtually all the natural rubber, coffee, coca, and hard fibers used by American consumers.

The North-South trade connection is important but it should not be overstated. We should remember that Japan is our second largest trading partner, and our neighbors, Canada and Mexico, are first and third, respectively. Moreover, in the aggregate, the European Community is our single largest trading partner. Indeed, in 1982, U.S. trade with the EC totaled $46 billion as compared with $32 billion with Canada.

On the financial side, the United States has traditionally been a large investor abroad, and conversely, has attracted a great deal of foreign investment. In the 1950's and 1960's, returns to investment were higher abroad than at home, and the United States was a heavy net foreign investor.

The counterpart to this foreign investment was a persistent surplus in our merchandise trade. By the 1970's, the demand for new capital abroad had decreased, as had the U.S. supply of savings. Thus, the United States ceased to be a net capital exporter and usually incurred a deficit in merchandise trade.

This history is described in greater and more informative detail in the "Economic Report of the President," so I will not develop it further here. There is a very interesting chapter in the "Economic Report" on the United States and world economy that I think is very well worth reading.[3] There are a number of points in there that they develop well.

The United States is also a significant factor in international financial institutions, as you all referred to. Our support of the World Bank and the International Development Association helps mobilize capital for vital projects in the developing world. In addition, we are a major factor in the International Monetary Fund. The IMF is an instrument of collective action and although we are not a borrower, we still benefit when it supplements global liquidity and provides members with temporary balance-of-payments financing.

In sum, whether looked at from the trade side or the financial side, the U.S. stake in the international economic system is significant—significant in terms of jobs, income, and opportunities. Specifically, we can infer from this brief overview that the United States has a clear stake in the promotion of trade, in the vitality of the international financial system, and in economic stability in developed and developing countries alike.

Beyond pure economics, however, we also have a stake that is more political in character. The demonstration of the strength and viability of market-oriented economies and the democratic form of government with which they are associated. We should seize this moment to prove the potential of the open market mentality that inspired the Yankee traders.

In so doing, however, our own system will be put on trial. Therefore, if we urge other countries to adopt market-oriented policies, we should be sure to adhere to those policies ourselves.

The world is now coming through a period of painful decompression from the severe inflationary surge of the 1970's. That period has left us with serious problems: High unemployment in the industrial countries, large public sector deficits that constrain recovery, and the heavy debt burden of some developing nations that now strains the international financial system. These problems had their origin in the decade of the seventies. An analysis of that period reveals that they may have a common solution—economic expansion in the 1980's.

The level of developing countries' total debt, which now stands at nearly $700 billion, increased more than sevenfold from 1972 to 1982. In the same 10-year period, debt to private lenders jumped from 40 to 60 percent of outstanding LDC debt. The conclusion drawn from these facts by those who wish to fix blame is that either the banks overlent during the 1970's or countries overborrowed.

The truth is that many bad judgments were made. But it is also true that after the oil price increases of 1973–74, lenders and borrowers acted on a set of assumptions; buoyant export growth and low interest rates, that though proven false, were thought reasonable at the time. The recycling of petrodollars from the OPEC nations to the nonoil LDCs was a highly profitable business for the banks. And since the loans were in inflation-depressed dollars, the LDCs assumed that today's loans would be repaid with cheaper dollars tomorrow. In this environment, indebtedness mounted.

It would be wrong, however, to characterize the legacy of the oil shock years as a debt problem. Rather, in its broadest aspect, it is an income-earning problem.

True, LDCs borrowed a lot in the 1970's, but our domestic corporations borrowed a lot, also. The difference is the corporations invest in productive capacity to generate income to repay their debts. Some LDCs, however, tended to invest in consumption rather than production, borrowing to finance internal income transfers. This strategy, although of questionable wisdom, was tolerable as long as LDC export earnings grew fast enough to service their debts.

That was, indeed, the case from 1975 to 1979 when LDC exports grew 22 percent annually, roughly keeping pace with the 25 percent annual growth of LDC debt.

In response to the second oil shock in 1978–79, however, the major industrialized nations adopted more restrictive monetary policies which slowed inflation, boosted interest rates and set in motion a retrenchment from the economic excesses of the 1970's.

High interest rates and a strong dollar increased LDC debt service costs. Simultaneously, LDC export earnings declined as the recession reduced the demand for the slashed prices of LDC commodities.

Indeed, nonoil commodity prices fell 28 percent between 1980 and 1982, increasing debt service ratios and eroding the terms of trade. As Tanzania's President, Julius Nyerere, has put it to buy a heavy truck in 1981, Tanzania had to produce 10 times as much tobacco or 4 times as much cotton, or 3 times as much coffee as it took to purchase the same truck just 5 years earlier.

The problem faced now by Tanzania and other high debt developing countries is not so much a debt problem as an income-earning problem: Rising debt service costs consume an ever-increasing proportion of declining export earnings. Many LDC's are now under pressure to increase exports and curb imports. This comes at a time when the industrialized countries face rising unemployment, declining real income and deteriorating trade balances. As a result, the international financial, trade and monetary systems are under serious strain.

I recognize that is kind of a shorthand summary of much of your hearings, Senator Mathias. [4]

The only lasting solution to the income-earning problem of the LDCs, as well as the serious problems of the industrial countries, is sustained economic growth without renewed inflation. The key to stimulating that growth lies in the interdependence forged in the 1970's of the world's economies.

Today, for example, the economic linkage between the industrialized West and the developing world is tighter than ever. Indeed, it has been estimated that if OECD GNP were to grow by 4 percent in 1983 rather than the projected 1.8 percent, the nonoil developing countries would earn an additional $15 billion on exports to the West, a figure equal to 14 percent of their estimated 1983 debt service payments.

The industrialized countries in my opinion are now poised to lead an expansion of the world economy. In particular, the United States is on the road to recovery. It appears to me personally—this is just a personal opinion—that the growth projections in the President's fiscal year 1984 budget will be exceeded. Interest rates are down, inflation is down, inventories are depleted. Basically, a very expansionary set of policies are in place. In short, the United States and other industrialized nations that have reduced inflation are positioned to play a vital role in world economic expansion.

The recent drop in oil prices may also stimulate expansion. Of course, an oil price decline is not unambiguously good, for any sudden unanticipated change in the world economy causes disruptions. An oil price decline may, for example, harm individual countries, especially net oil exporting LDCs such as Mexico and Venezuela.

But assume for the sake of illustration, as distinct from prediction—I underline that—but I want an illustration, and I take a big enough case so we can really kind of get an idea of the orders of magnitude involved here: a decline, say, to $20 a barrel which is a 40-percent drop. It has been estimated that such a price decline would, in the aggregate, have the following catalytic impact over a 2-year period:

Real growth rates in industrial countries would increase 1 to 1 1/2 percent, and developing country rates 2 to 2 1/2 percent. Inflation in the United States and elsewhere would decline 1 1/2 to 2 1/2 percent; the 1983 oil-import bill for industrial countries would drop by $90 billion, and that for LDCs by $9 billion. The OECD current account balance would swing from a deficit of $18 billion to a surplus of $17 billion. Simultaneously, LDC exports would rise 3 percent, cutting their current account deficit by $18 billion. A less significant oil-price decline would have similar positive effects, roughly proportional to the reduction from current prices.

Now, I say this not as a prediction but just to point up that with all of the handwringing you sometimes hear of about the possibility of oil-price declines, there is a very positive side if that should happen. And this just gives some notion of the orders of magnitude involved in the direction and the effect.

SENATOR BOSCHWITZ. Are you going to make a prediction later on in your testimony?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. No, sir; I have one, but I am not talking.

The salutary effects of the world economic expansion will not come about automatically. The United States, together with other nations, must work to insure that the opportunities for growth are seized. In turn, this means that we must concentrate our efforts on four objectives. First, insuring sufficient liquidity in the international financial system; second, preserving open markets; third, improving the international monetary system; and, fourth, insuring political stability in the developing world.

In working toward each of these objectives, which I shall address in turn, cooperation will be essential. Cooperation between the public and private sectors, between the developed and developing worlds, between business and Government, and between the executive branch and the Congress.

The basic elements for successfully dealing with the liquidity problems of the high debt developing countries are known and in place. The so-called debt bomb can be defused through emergency, short-term bridge financing, leading to adjustment programs implemented in conjunction with the IMF and with the cooperation of commercial banks.

Private banks, however, are now reducing their rate of new lending to the developing world. Net new bank lending was flat between the first half of 1981 and the first half of 1982. Estimates for the second half of 1982 show a precipitous drop in new lending, which we have to say it is not surprising that that should happen under the circumstances.

Such an abrupt contraction in new lending obviously would imperil the recovery of the debtor countries. Moreover, reduced lending in the face of increased debt-service costs would also retard our own recovery by contracting LDC imports from the West. Indeed, as Rimmer de Vries recently testified, [5] a Morgan Guaranty Trust Co. study estimates that if capital flows into the LDCs were cut by $25 billion, OECD growth would drop at least a half a percentage point. With OECD growth in 1983 expected to be only 1.8 percent, half of a percentage point represents a significant cut in growth.

The Morgan Guaranty study is hypothetical. But import cuts are already a reality. A dramatic case in point is Mexico whose 1982 imports from the United States dropped 36 percent from the 1981 level. Consequently, in the course of a single year, the U.S. balance on merchandise trade with Mexico swung from a $3.7 billion surplus to a $4.5 billion deficit.

[5] The testimony of Rimmer de Vries, Senior Vice President and Chief International Economist of Morgan Guaranty Trust, before the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy on January 19, 1983, is printed ibid., pp. 127–131.

The international economy is too vulnerable to this kind of contradiction to permit a continued decline in lending to the Third World. Private banks have a collective interest in extending sufficient new money to permit the developing countries to service their debts. Western governments, including our own, have a similar stake in seeing that the LDCs have sufficient capital to pay for imports of goods and services that will enhance LDC productivity and contribute to world economic expansion.

The United States, I believe, stands ready to do its part in this effort. Where appropriate, we will provide funds, as was the case with Mexico, through bridge financing, CCC credits, Eximbank loans or swap facilities.

This administration will also be seeking congressional support for the expansion of IMF resources, coming directly to Senator Pell's question. In just-concluded negotiations last Friday, member countries agreed upon a quota increase of 47.5 percent. [6] The U.S. share of this increase will be approximately $5.8 billion. I might note that the quota increase is not a U.S. budget item—this, I think, is going to be responsive to your point, Senator Boschwitz—for it represents an exchange of financial assets; cash in exchange for a drawing right on the IMF.

More importantly, our quota represents an investment in international financial well-being. The purpose of the IMF is not to pay off old debts, but to encourage sound policies. Indeed, indications are that a borrowing country's creditworthiness tends to improve with the successful implementation of an IMF program, and private lending then generally increases rather than declines. A quota increase is thus an inherent component of any program to encourage world economic growth.

Another component of such a program is the expansion of the general agreements to borrow. A GAB was initially established by 10 industrialized nations as a backup line of credit to be drawn upon solely by the 10 contributing countries. [7]

However, late last month in Paris, the United States, together with the other nations of the group of 10, agreed to almost triple the GAB from $7 billion to $19 billion. [8] Our share of this expansion is $2.6 billion. I think, incidentally, the number that is being quoted is the sum of the $5.8 and the $2.6 billion. That is where that $8.4 billion figure comes from.

Unlike the traditional GAB, access to this expanded fund will not be limited to the G–10 alone, but will be accessible to any country whose liquidity problems threaten the financial system as a whole.

Our share of the IMF quota increase and the GAB expansion totals $8.4 billion. This is the amount we will be asking Congress to approve before the end of 1983. And Secretary Regan, of course, is the pointman in presenting that to you, [9] but I want to say here that I fully support what he is doing, and I think the combination of Don Regan's efforts and Paul Volcker's efforts with other finance ministers, and central bankers, and Jacques de La Roussiere [de Larosière], an outstanding international civil servant, has been very important here and effective.

Let me turn to the trading system. Even if the sustained bank lending and increased IMF resources prevent a sharp contraction in LDC liquidity, the success

For text of the IMF press communiqué, see ibid., pp. 442–445.

[7] Under the General Arrangements to Borrow (GAB), established in 1962, the ten wealthiest members of the International Monetary Fund agreed to lend their currencies to the IMF up to specified amounts when supplementary resources were needed. The members of this Group of Ten (G–10) are Belgium, Canada, West Germany, France, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Sweden, the United Kingdom, and the United States. Switzerland, informally associated with the Group for several years, was approved as a full participant in the GAB on December 26, 1983. See footnote 5 to document 77.

[8] At a meeting in Paris, January 18, 1983, the finance ministers and central bank governors of the Group of Ten decided to increase their aggregate credit commitments under the GAB from SDR 6.4 billion to SDR 17 billion ($7.1 billion to $19.0 billion). of our financial efforts will ultimately depend on adjustments in the trade accounts of developed and developing countries alike. Import cuts can provide only so much; export growth must lead the way in the recovery of the LDCs. Therefore, we must resist protectionist pressures and seek to preserve the system of open trade we helped to build.

The recession and high rates of unemployment in the West understandably have increased protectionist pressures. The 98th Congress will probably confront local content legislation, agricultural and other subsidies and a host of protectionist proposals directed at hard-hit sectors such as steel and autos.

These protectionist moves threaten to impede our own recovery and economic expansion generally. Quotas, tariffs, and other trade barriers raise costs to us and deny borrowing countries the hard-currency earnings needed to service their debts and buy our exports. Conversely, open trade speeds resources to their most productive uses and creates more jobs than it destroys.

That does not mean, however, that we should acquiesce in other nations' trade-distorting practices, especially those imposed on sectors such as agriculture and services, in which we enjoy a comparative advantage.

This is what we were discussing just before coming here, Mr. Chairman.

Subsidized agricultural exports from the EC, for example, have enabled European farmers to expand their share of third country markets at the expense of U.S. farmers. In response, we recently sold subsidized wheat flour to Egypt.

Temporary, trade-distorting measures such as the wheat flour transaction can be justified on the ground that "when all the world is mad, 'tis folly to be sane." But we should remember these are insane things to be doing.

Temporary measures tend to become permanent; and retaliation has an inherent tendency to escalate. Constructive negotiations—in which we meet unreason with reason—present the only lasting solution to protectionist problems such as export subsidies.

We have a situation emerging where, for example, through this competitive subsidy program various countries in the world will be producing butter, and as the butter gets sold in the world market and winds up in the Soviet Union, through this insane system of subsidies butter will be produced and sold to the Soviet housewife at about one-quarter the price the American housewife pays for it.

Can anyone explain why that makes sense? I do not see it.

We will, therefore, work within the GATT to remove barriers to the export of U.S. services and agricultural products. In addition, we will work on a bilateral basis, as I did on my trip to Japan, to roll back trade barriers. Difficult but important negotiations with the EC on agricultural trade subsidies are now in process. Finally, we will seek concrete ways of implementing the open trade pledges made by the major industrialized countries at the Versailles Summit and the GATT Ministerial.

Turning to the monetary system, trade is encouraged by stability in exchange markets—something we have not had in recent years. The instability of relative currency values over the last decade is basically a reflection of turbulent economic conditions. But several developments have created recent problems for the trading position of U.S. producers.

Financial flows, for example, are having a powerful effect on exchange rate movements. This presents difficulties from the standpoint of trade. During 1982 financial flows into the United States led to the greatest appreciation of the dollar since the beginning of floating rates in 1973. The strong dollar increased the price of U.S. exports and decreased the cost competitiveness of U.S. industry. Consequently, the U.S. trade deficit in 1983 is expected to widen.

Moreover, if large outyear budget deficits are not reduced, they will consume U.S. national savings, which already accumulate at the lowest annual rate in the industrial world. A shortage of savings would drive up both real interest rates and the dollar, thereby further widening our trade deficit.

In other words, what is happening to us here is we suddenly find ourselves in a kind of Switzerland position where big financial flows are having an effect on the value of the dollar. The market is behaving just right. I mean it is reflecting what is happening. However, when you look at trade, that strong dollar is making our goods much less competitive in third markets, thereby presenting a real trade problem to us.

An additional problem we face in the international monetary system is the great volatility in exchange rates. For example, between May and November of 1982, the yen depreciated from about 230 yen to the dollar to 276, raising the price of U.S. exports in Japan and third country markets, and reducing the price of Japanese imports in the United States. By the end of the year, however, the yen had swung back to its previous level of 230.

This point was made very vividly to me by Lee Morgan, the head of Caterpillar Tractor. And the effect of the big swing was basically to knock Caterpillar out of a whole set of third-country markets. It is not because something was wrong with management or they did not know how to sell in third markets or whatever. It was the tremendous impact on them of the swing in exchange rates.

The solution to such excessive exchange rate volatility is not clear. What is clear, however, is that the problem warrants close study by the major currency countries.

Finally, even if we succeed in increasing LDC liquidity, preserving relatively open trade and decreasing volatility in the exchange markets, adjustment for many developing countries still will be difficult—in some cases, testing what the social fabric will bear. Developing countries have had to accommodate the recession in the West and their own financial problems by cutting imports and curbing economic growth. Aggregate real LDC growth this year will be about 1 to 1.5 percent—the lowest since 1950. African countries have been especially hard hit because of their dependence on exports of primary commodities. Increasingly desperate, they are tempted by repressive strategies and radical panaceas.

LDC austerity can, if excessive, risk political instability that endangers U.S. strategic interests. In this hemisphere, economic difficulties threaten to increase illegal immigration into the United States. Economic troubles were a factor in the recent expulsion of hundreds of thousands of Ghanians from Nigeria. And economic difficulties in the Sudan could, for example, threaten the U.S. interest in Middle East stability.

In short, our own strategic interests dictate the following rule: While LDC adjustment is necessary, such adjustment must take place within the limits of the politically possible, and with sufficient financial support to maintain stability and spark renewed growth.

This analysis has, by necessity, been quite general. Yet I think its implications are straightforward. The problems currently burdening the international economy—recession, high unemployment, LDC debt—all have a common solution: economic expansion. If growth in the world economy resumes and real interest rates fall, the debt burden of even the most heavily indebted countries will become manageable.

The key to recovery from the debt problems, however, lies in increased exports from developing countries. That increase is in turn dependent on an expansion of our own economy and those of other industrialized countries. Economic expansion anywhere can help everywhere—but not necessarily.

For if we expand, while simultaneously erecting protectionist barriers, neither the LDCs nor the industrialized countries will benefit from that mutually reinforcing boost to recovery provided by open trade. In shutting out goods from the rest of the world, we will incur not only the usual costs of protection—higher prices to consumers and jobs lost in the export sector—but retard our own recovery and threaten the world economic system as well.

Our challenge, therefore, is to revitalize the international financial system; preserve and extend the benefits of open trade; improve the monetary system; and insure political stability in the developing world. This administration is working hard to achieve these four objectives, all of which contribute to world economic expansion. Our own economy will play a leading role in that expansion. As a result, we have an opportunity to demonstrate the continued viability of our market-oriented economy, and the democratic institutions it supports.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Address by the Secretary of the Treasury (Regan) Before the Council on Foreign Relations, New York, September 13, 1983 [10]

The Foundations of U.S. International Economic Policy

Thank you very much for the warm welcome. It is a pleasure to be here this afternoon to discuss the international economic policy of the Reagan administration.

A career here in New York, followed by 30 months in Washington, has given me the opportunity to view things both from the perspective of a businessman and the perspective of a government official. Moving from one role to another, one learns to appreciate the true dimensions of the link between public policy and private enterprise.

An understanding of that linkage has been the foundation of both domestic and international economic policy under this Administration. Our policies and actions reflect a conviction that economic and social progress stems not from the dictates of government officials, but from the actions of individual citizens from all parts of our society, representing all sectors of our economy. It is the government's job to ensure that its policies and institutions provide a framework within which these actions can be freely taken, where the marketplace can function efficiently and effectively for the benefit of all.

This market-oriented approach is sometimes described as naive and simplistic. The experience of the last 2 1/2 years confirms, however, that it is the only way to obtain lasting economic progress. This is perhaps clearest in the vigorous economic recovery now underway in the United States. The recovery has brought a 9.2 percent growth rate in the second quarter, continued strong growth in the current quarter, unemployment dropping from 10.8 percent to 9.5 percent and an inflation rate of only 3.2 percent so far this year. But it is also borne out in the international arena. Examination of some key areas of this administration's current international economic policy reveals that they are realistic and capable of striking an appropriate balance among strongly conflicting interests.

I will spend a few minutes this afternoon describing our policies toward economic growth and development, the international monetary system, and international trade. I would then like to outline the decisionmaking mechanism we have been using to design and implement these policies. Finally, I will comment on the way in which interrelationships among the various aspects of our international economic policy are reflected in our response to the international debt problem.

The basic goal of all economic policy is to provide an environment which is conducive to economic growth and development. In that sense, it is almost redundant to say that this administration has a "policy toward growth and development." Nevertheless, in the common usage in which that phrase is associated with our relations with less developed countries, we do in fact have a consistent policy approach.

A vivid historical testimonial to the effectiveness of the free-market approach is the remarkable performance of the Western economic system in the first two postwar decades. Domestically, most of the major industrial economies were rebuilt along free-market lines. Internationally, the major factor underlying the ensuing growth performance was a dramatic expansion in world trade and capital flows—an expansion made possible only by the open trade and payments system that was put into place after the war. Shepherding the creation of a liberal Western economic system were three key international institutions—the IMF, the World Bank, and the GATT.

These same factors helped to make the postwar era a period of unparalleled improvement in the living standards of developing countries. The LDCs are not a homogeneous group, and, therefore, it is dangerous to make sweeping generalizations about them. But despite the diversity of their cultures, resource endowments, and other essential characteristics, there are some common themes which we believe are applicable in our economic relations with all developing countries.

These themes were reflected in the results of a comprehensive study of the multilateral development banks which I commissioned early in this administration. [11]

Sound and disciplined domestic economic policies are necessary to enable these countries to make effective use of both their indigenous resources and resource flows from abroad. These include noninflationary monetary policy, budgetary discipline, realistic exchange rates, and avoidance of widespread subsidies and price controls. Capital inflows can make a major contribution to the development process—although as we have seen, it is possible for foreign capital to become a burden rather than a blessing if borrowing is excessive or if the funds are not used productively. Open and non-discriminatory policies toward foreign trade and private investment flows are crucial to attracting these funds, just as sound domestic economic management helps to ensure they are used productively and that the confidence of foreign investors is maintained.

While effective domestic economic management and private trade and capital flows are the most important factors in the growth process, there is also a role for development assistance in some cases. We do not believe continuous, massive resource transfers are the key to economic development: the international economy is not a zero-sum game in which the real income of one country can only be increased by transferring income from wealthier countries. But we recognize that there are cases in which needs are so pressing and key markets and institutions so underdeveloped that official financial flows on concessional terms can be an effective means of assisting the development process. In addition, when it is used correctly, official assistance can be a catalyst for even larger flows of additional private finance. For this reason, the Reagan administration has substantially increased bilateral economic assistance, and supports effective programs in the multilateral development banks.

Given the many links among national economies and the importance of international trade and investment flows, there is a critical need for a smoothly functioning international monetary system. It goes without saying that in our recent experience, the functioning of the system has not been as smooth as we would like. There have been many suggestions that performance could be improved considerably through systematic reforms—changes in the basic rules and institutions of the international monetary system. While we always need to be alert to ways the system can be strengthened, proposals for sweeping systematic changes are generally based on false premises.

It is clear that recent international monetary turbulence mostly reflects improper policy decisions by governments—rather than basic flaws in the system. Wide swings in exchange rates, severe debt problems, and other frictions in the system are part of the heritage of unsound and inflationary economic policies. We believe that the key to greater stability in the monetary system is to promote more uniformly sound economic policies and performance among its participants—eliminating the inflationary excesses that undermine a nation's international creditworthiness and the extreme disparities in economic performance which drive large exchange rate movements.

In order to promote this type of convergence in economic policies and performance, the United States sought, and obtained, agreement among Heads of State at the Versailles Summit to begin a process of frank and confidential consultations designed to identify troublesome economic differences. In the year between the Versailles and Williamsburg Summits, I chaired two meetings of Summit Finance Ministers and central bank Governors under this process, with participation by IMF Managing Director de Larosière — first in Toronto last September, and again in Washington in April.

In an Annex to the Williamsburg Communiqué, [12] we obtained reaffirmation of the central importance of economic convergence, and agreement that the process begun at Versailles should be enhanced by focusing on performance objectives and near-term actions to guide and hasten convergence. The first meeting under this enhanced consultation process will be held later this month at the time of the IMF/World Bank Annual meetings. [13]

At Williamsburg, we also agreed to improve consultations on exchange market conditions, and to engage in coordinated intervention at times to counter disorderly market conditions. With turbulent market conditions having arisen, coordinated interventions of this type led to some $250 million of U.S. market intervention in late July and early August. But as our Summit partners agreed at Williamsburg, and as recent experience has once again demonstrated, intervention is at most a very limited tool for dealing with very short-run disturbances. We were not then, and do not intend to, intervene to change the basic direction of exchange rates. The basic U.S. policy remains one of minimal intervention and reliance on the workings of the market.

The Reagan administration's support for free trade remains a basic cornerstone of our international economic policy. We recognize that postwar liberalization of the interventional trade and payments system—by restoring convertible currencies, gradually removing exchange and capital controls, and reducing tariffs and quotas—gave impetus to vigorous postwar economic growth, just as widespread protectionism contributed to the Great Depression. Only last week, President Reagan released a policy statement which spelled out clearly our commitment to free flows of international investment. [14] The essence of our international investment policy parallels our trade policy—we oppose measures which distort or impede international investment flows and believe that foreign investment flows which respond to market forces lead to more efficient international production, benefitting home and host country alike.

However, in the United States, as in virtually every other country in the world, recession and high unemployment have brought growing political pressures for protectionism. It is ironic that protectionist sentiment is becoming strongest at a time when economic recovery from the recession is well underway—ironic not just because one of the underlying causes of this pressure is therefore already fading, but also because unless resisted, widespread protectionism and retaliation could abort the very recovery that is restoring jobs—and creating new jobs—for millions of Americans.

It is thus easy to see why we consider it essential that these pressures be resisted; the difficult question is how to do so. We have exercised leadership in international consultations and negotiations, to roll back protectionism and build support for further trade liberalization. This type of forward movement is difficult to achieve in the current world economic environment, but I believe there is potential for significant progress in the agreements reached at the Williamsburg Summit for work programs in the OECD and GATT.

There is also beginning to be greater recognition of important linkages between trade policy and our efforts to deal with international financial and debt problems, linkages which had long been ignored due to the tradition of non-communication between trade and financial officials. Ambassador Brock and I hosted a dinner involving trade ministers and finance ministers from many of the industrial countries last spring to begin a dialog on trade/finance linkages. [15] While this may not appear to be an earth-shattering event, it was an interesting evening in at least one way.

It was the first international gathering I have attended at which the introductions of officials from within the same governments took longer than introductions of officials from different governments. Now that trade and finance ministers in each of these countries have finally met one another—and found out that they not only actually work within the same government but also sometimes even on the same problems—we are hoping to get down to some real business. More seriously, we intend to follow up on this initial meeting to ensure that trade and financial policies will be more mutually supportive of the common objectives of an open and growing trading system.

[15] On the evening of May 10, 1983, following the conclusion of the Ministerial meeting of the OECD in Paris, Secretary Regan and Special Trade Representative Brock hosted a dinner at the Pré Catalan restaurant for the trade and finance ministers of about eight countries and representatives from the OECD, IMF, and GATT. Although not all invited trade and finance ministers were able to attend, the dinner provided an opportunity to discuss international economic issues from both a trade and finance perspective.

In the Reagan administration, we have designed our internal decisionmaking process on international economic policy to ensure a thorough exploration of the implications of specific policy issues and the linkages among them. Although primary responsibility for specific areas of economic policy is assigned to individual departments, all significant policy options are identified by Cabinet groups reporting to the President.

Early in the Administration, a number of Cabinet Councils were established to bring together Cabinet officials with an interest in certain broad policy areas. The Cabinet Council mechanism, which focuses primarily on the domestic implications of policy decisions, was supplemented last year with a new Cabinet-level body called the Senior Interagency Group on International Economic Policy (or SIG–IEP). The SIG–IEP, which I chair and whose staff support is provided mainly by the Treasury Department, reports or makes recommendations on all major international economic policy decisions to the President, mainly through the National Security Council.

Its regular members include the Vice President, the Secretaries of State, Defense, Agriculture, and Commerce, the Directors of OMB and the CIA, the U.S. Trade Representatives, the Assistants to the President for National Security Affairs and Policy Development, and the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers. In addition, other Departments and agencies are represented for specific issues, to the degree necessary to ensure a thorough discussion of all domestic, international, and foreign policy or national security ramifications.

In its earliest meetings in the summer of 1982, the SIG–IEP focused primarily on pipeline sanctions against the Soviet Union—a divisive issue between us and our major allies. The SIG has now met 37 times. Its agenda has been broadened to encompass all areas of international economic policy. In addition, it has been backed up by constant preparation of studies and options papers under the auspices of the Treasury-chaired Interagency Group on International Economic Policy.

I believe the U.S. Government response to international debt problems over the past year provides a very good example of the linkages among economic issues, and of the operation of our present decisionmaking process. The first major country in which problems reached a crisis stage was Mexico in late August of last year. Led by the United States, major governments acted immediately to provide emergency financial assistance. This assistance, which ultimately totalled about $3.8 billion, took the form of temporary Treasury and Federal Reserve swap lines, international swap lines from the BIS, a U.S. contract to purchase oil for the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, and export credit guarantees by CCC, Eximbank, and their foreign counterparts. The energy package provided time for a series of discussions, both within the U.S. Government and internationally, to determine the exact nature of Mexico's financial and economic difficulties and options for dealing with them.

After initial steps were taken to handle the emergency in August of 1982, working groups were organized under the auspices of the SIG–IEP to consider both the specific responses that should be made in the case of Mexico and the broader issue of U.S. strategy to cope with the emerging debt problems in other countries. The current U.S. strategy, designed to permit an orderly economic adjustment in borrowing countries to permit them to regain creditworthiness and resume sustainable economic growth, was developed as a result of this process and endorsed by our major allies at Williamsburg.

The rationale for a vigorous response by the United States and the other creditor nations is our recognition of the interdependence of national economies. Unless handled carefully, a liquidity crisis in a major borrowing country could threaten the stability of the entire international monetary system. In addition, interdependence implies that in the long run, the resumption of a healthy economic expansion in troubled debtor countries helps safeguard growth prospects in all other countries. From the immediate perspective of the United States, neither our current recovery nor our longer-term growth prospects would be well served by the economic collapse of our major Latin American trading partners. Finally, commercial banks tend to pull back from international lending in response to international liquidity problems, but international trade cannot take place without continued financial flows.

For all of these reasons, a forceful government response was imperative. However, the basic premises of that response follow from our market-oriented approach to economic policy. Our strategy has been designed to get effective adjustment programs in place in troubled borrowing countries, reducing external borrowing requirements and creating the sound policy environment needed to make effective use of both domestic resources and future foreign borrowing. At the same time, we have worked to maintain the international lending, particularly from commercial banks, necessary for orderly economic relations.

In the case of Mexico, our emergency financing package was followed up by negotiations among the Mexican government, the IMF, and commercial banks. The IMF approved a strong 3-year program of economic adjustment, designed to control inflation and public spending and to bring down the ballooning current account deficit. In addition, a liberalization of Mexico's trade and payments system was set in motion, supported by an exchange rate policy which reflected the realities of the marketplace.

To facilitate Mexico's courageous adjustment efforts, the IMF is providing a total of $3.9 billion of balance of payments financing over a 3-year period. Commercial banks, in turn, initially rolled over $10 billion of maturing debt, and then recognized Mexico's adjustment efforts by providing $5 billion of new net lending for 1983. In addition, they have begun negotiations to reschedule $20 billion of public sector debt, with $11 billion of that rescheduling completed at the end of last month.

Although the basic strategy developed by the SIG–IEP for responding to debt problems is in place, the SIG continues to monitor the situation regularly and periodically reconsiders policy options. So far, although Mexico's adjustment effort is far from ended, we are very encouraged by the progress that has been made. Economic measures are taking hold, with the current account swinging from deficit to surplus and inflation and the public sector deficit starting to decline. An indication of new-found financial strength was Mexico's ability to repay on schedule, by the end of August, all of the emergency swap lines extended last year.

The basic mechanisms are now in plac for successful management of the interna tional debt problem, although there ma be occasional difficult periods over th next year or two. Even in the case o countries like Brazil, which are not as fa down the road to successful conclusion, i is clear what needs to be done and th work is proceeding. The Brazilian prob lem has been very much on our minds i recent months, and all parties have bee putting forth their best efforts to resolv it. Although the situation is complex an difficult, we are increasingly optimisti about the eventual outcome.

The debt problem is one we would hav preferred not to inherit. But as has bee the case when we have applied ou market-oriented approach to other area it is a challenge that this administration' international economic policy has prove capable of meeting. We do not follo market-oriented policies just as a matte of faith, or because we are ideologues—w follow them because experience has den onstrated they work.

Our overall policy approach has led t an improvement in American economi performance, and in the internationa arena, has served well both the Unite States, and those of our trading partner who have adopted a similar approach. fully expect this administration's interna tional economic policy to be a continue source of economic progress as we me the challenges of the future.

Thank you.

Address by President Reagan Before the Commonwealth Club, San Francisco, March 4, 1983 [1]

The Trade Challenge for the 1980's

Thank you very much for a warm welcome that warms my heart. And I will confess that it is, kind of lump-in-the-throat time, also. Henry, I thank you very much. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished ladies and gentlemen here at the head table, I almost feel like we all should be going back to Sacramento. (Laughter)

Forgive me for a bit of nostalgia here. I remember, so well, those previous eight times, and many of them during those happy days in Sacramento. And this time, I can claim the best of both worlds, a California homecoming and a reunion with my fellow members of the Commonwealth Club—all wrapped up in one. And Nancy and I could not think of a better way to spend our anniversary. (Laughter; applause)

But it is a pleasure to be back here where the crossroads of trade are meeting places for ideas that stretch our sights to the limits of the horizon and beyond. This Golden Gate city is a place where entrepreneurs with great dreams, daring and determination chart new paths to progress through the winds and waters of commerce.

You provide an appropriate setting for an American challenge for the 1980's. With the help of your vision, courage, and leadership, we can begin the first leg of a new voyage into the future, a future in which commerce will be king, the eagle will soar, and America will be the mightiest trading nation on earth.

I have not come here to echo those faint hearts who have little faith in American enterprise and ingenuity. They plead for retreat and seek refuge in the rusty armor of a failed, protectionist past. Well, I believe, and I think you do too, that the world hungers for leadership and growth, that America can provide it. And my message is that our administration will fight to give you the tools you need, because we know you can get the job done.

Our forefathers didn't shed their blood to create this Union so that we could become a victim nation. We're not sons and daughters of second-rate stock. We have no mission of mediocrity. We were born to carry liberty's banner and build the very meaning of progress, and our opportunities have never been greater. We can improve the well-being of our people, and we can enhance the forces for democracy, freedom, peace, and human fulfillment around the world, if we stand up for principles of trade expansion through freer markets and greater competition among nations. (Applause)

In dealing with our economy, more is in question than just prosperity. Ultimately, peace and freedom are at stake. The United States took the lead after World War II in creating an international trading and financial system that limited government's ability to disrupt trade. We did this, because history had taught us the freer the flow of trade across borders, the greater the world economic progress and the greater the impetus for world peace. (Applause) But the deterioration of the free world and U.S. economies in the 1970's led to the decline of Western security and the confidence of the people of the free world.

Too many otherwise free nations adopted policies of government intervention in the marketplace. Many people began thinking that equity was incompatible with growth. And they argued for no-growth societies, for policies that undermined free markets and compromised our collective security. There can be no real security without a strong Western economy. And there can be no freedom unless we preserve the open and competitive international and financial system that we created after World War II. Prosperity alone cannot restore confidence or protect our basic values. We must, also, remember our objectives of peace and freedom. And then, we can build a prosperity that will, once again, lift our heads and renew our spirits.

Now, I am not going to minimize the problems that we face or the long, tough road that we must travel to solve them. For a quarter of a century after the second World War, we exported more goods each year to the rest of the world than we imported. We accumulated a surplus of funds which was invested at home and abroad, and which created jobs and increased economic prosperity. But during the past decade, we began importing more than we were exporting. Since 1976, imports have exceeded exports every year. And our trade deficit is expected to rise sharply in this year of 1983.

In the past few years, high real interest rates have inhibited investment, greatly increased the value of the dollar, and made our goods—as a result—less competitive. High interest rates reflect skepticism by financial markets that our government has the courage to keep inflation down by reducing deficit spending.

Well, if the history of our great nation and the character of this breed called American mean anything at all, it is that, when we have believed in ourselves, when we pull together—putting our wisdom and faith into action, we made the future work for us. And we can do that now.

Wealth is not created inside some think-tank on the Potomac. It is born in the hearts and minds of entrepreneurs all across Main Street America. For too long, government has treated the entrepreneur more as an enemy than an ally. Our administration has a better idea. We'll give you less bureaucracy, if you give America your audacity. (Applause) We want you to out-plan, out-produce, and out-sell the pants off this nation's competitors. (Applause) You see, I believe in what General Patton once said, and I'm partial to cavalry officers. (Laughter) He said, "Don't tell people how to do things. Tell them what needs doing and then watch them surprise you with their ingenuity." (Applause)

Every citizen has a role and a stake in helping the United States meet her trade challenge in the 1980's. We need jobs. Well, one of the best job programs we can have is a great national drive to expand exports and that's part of our program.

We have only to look beyond our own borders. The potential for growth is enormous: A $2 trillion market abroad, a chance to create millions of jobs and more income security for our people. We have barely seen the tip of that iceberg. Four out of five new manufacturing jobs created in the last five years were in export-related industries. And yet 90 percent of American manufacturers do not export at all. We believe tens of thousands of U.S. producers offer products and services which can be competitive abroad. Now, many of these are small- and medium-sized firms.

Our administration has a positive plan to meet the trade challenge on three key points. First, lay a firm foundation for non-inflationary growth based on enduring economic principles of fiscal and monetary discipline, competition, incentives, thrift and reward. Second, enhance the ability of U.S. producers and industries to compete on a fair and equal basis in the international marketplace; work with our trading partners to resolve outstanding problems of market access, and to chart new directions for free and fair trade in the products of the future. Third, take the lead in assisting international financial and trade institutions to strengthen world growth and bolster the forces of freedom and democracy. Taken together, these actions give the United States a positive framework for leading our producers and trading partners toward more open markets, greater freedom and human progress.

But progress begins at home. Our economic reforms are based on time-tested principles: Spending and monetary restraint to bring down inflation and interest rates, and to give leaders [2] confidence in long-term price stability; less regulatory interference so as to stimulate greater competition; and growth of enterprise and employment through tax incentives to encourage work, thrift, investment and productivity.

Now, we've suffered a long, painful recession brought about by more than a decade of overtaxing and spending and yes, government intervention.

But recession is giving way to a rainbow of recovery, reflecting a renaissance in enterprise. America is on the mend.

Inflation has plunged from 12.4 percent in 1980 to just 3.8 percent in the last 12 months. And in the last six months, it's been running at 1.4 percent. We've sought common sense in government and competition, not controls in the marketplace. Two years ago, we accelerated the deregulation of crude oil. And we heard ourselves denounced for fueling inflation. Well, the national average for a gallon of gasoline when we took office was $1.27 and now you can buy it in most places for less than a dollar. The prime interest rate was a crippling 21 1/2 percent. Now, it's down to 10 1/2 percent. Tax rates have been cut. Real wages are improving. Personal savings and productivity are growing again. The stock market has hit a record high. Venture capital investments have reached record levels. Production in housing, autos and steel is gaining strength. And new breakthroughs in high technology are busting out all over. Katy, bar the door. We're on our way back. (Applause)

Let me say to the pessimists who would cancel our remaining tax incentives, I have one thing to say: Don't lay a hand on the third year of the people's tax cut or the indexing provision. Indexing is our promise—(applause)—it's our promise to every working man and woman that the future will not be like the past. There will be no more sneaky, midnight tax increases by a government resorting to bracket creep to indulge its thirst for deficit spending. To pretend eliminating indexes is somehow fair to working people reminds me of Samuel Johnson's comment about the fellow who couldn't see any difference between vice and virtue. He said, "Well, when he leaves the house, let's count the spoons." (Laughter)

Capping the third year tax cut and eliminating indexing and our remaining tax cuts would send the worst possible signal to potential exporters. As I mentioned, 90 percent of U.S. businesses do not export at all. And about 85 percent of our firms pay their taxes by the personal income tax. If those who would dismantle the tax cuts get their way, the chilling message to the business community will be: "Don't scrap and struggle to succeed, export, expand your business and hire more workers because we won't thank and reward you for helping your country. We'll punish you."

Well, maybe I'm old-fashioned, but I don't think pitting one group of Americans against another is what the Founding Fathers had in mind. This nation was not built on a foundation of envy and resentment. The dream I've always believed in is, no matter who you are, no matter where you come from, if you work hard, pull yourself up and succeed, then, by golly, you deserve life's prize. And trying for that prize made America the greatest nation on earth. Let us create more opportunities for all our citizens. And let us encourage achievement and excellence. We want America to be a nation of winners again.

So you might as well know that we will not turn our backs on the principles of our recovery program, especially on the principles of free trade. The great English historian, Thomas Babington Macaulay, wrote more than a century ago that free trade, one of the greatest blessings which a government can confer on a people, is unpopular in almost every country. Well, for some, times haven't changed.

There is a great hue and cry for us to bend to protectionist pressures. Well, I've been around long enough to remember that when we did that once before in this century, something called Smoot–Hawley,[3] we lived through a nightmare. World trade fell by 60 percent, contributing to the Great Depression and to the political turmoil that led to World War II. We and our trading partners are in the same boat. If one partner shoots a hole in the bottom of the boat, does it make sense for the other partner to shoot another hole in the boat? There are those who say yes and call it getting tough. I call it getting wet—all over. (Laughter) (Applause)

We must plug the holes in the boat of open markets and free trade and set sail again in the direction of prosperity. No one, no one should mistake our determination to use our full power and influence to prevent anyone from destroying the boat and sinking us all. There's a fundamental difference between positive support of legitimate American interests and rights in world trade and the negative actions of protectionists. Free trade can only survive if all parties play by the same rules. But we're determined to ensure equity in our markets, defending workers in industries from unfair and predatory trade practices is not protectionism. It's legitimate action under U.S. and international law.

Now, one example of protectionist legislation that could quickly sabotage recovery is the local content rule.[4] This legislation, proposed in the Congress, would force foreign and domestic manufacturers of automobiles sold in the United States to build their cars with an escalating percentage of U.S. parts and domestic labor. The Congressional Budget Office concluded that this would destroy more jobs than it would save. And that's true. It would add substantially to the cost of a new car.

What the proponents of this bunker mentality never point out is that the costs of protectionism for one group of workers are always passed on to another group down the line. And once such legislation is passed, every other industry would be a target for foreign retaliation. We would buy less from our partners. They'd buy less from us. The world economic pie would shrink. Chances for political turmoil would increase dramatically.

Rather than reacting in fear with beggar-thy-neighbor policies, let us lead from strength and believe in our abilities. Let's work at home and abroad to enhance the ability of U.S. producers and industries to compete on a fair and equal basis in the international marketplace.

We are very excited about some landmark legislation that I signed last year—signed, as a matter of fact, here in California: The Export Trading Company Act.[5] It is an innovative idea based on teamwork. I am confident it will create thousands of new exporters. And I hope some of them are sitting in this room. The law is designed to attract manufacturers, export-management companies, banks, freight-forwarders, and other export services into joint efforts to gain foreign markets. The Commerce Department is holding seminars across the country to promote the legislation. And the response has been remarkable.

Thousands have attended. And in some cases, the numbers were so overwhelming people had to be turned away. The majority of attendees have not been lawyers, tax accountants or, forgive me, bankers, but business people—(laughter)—the people who can take this legislation and use it. They can expand our markets, become exporters, or sell to export trading companies who can do it for them. The bottom-line will be a breakthrough in exports, higher growth, lower deficits, and a tremendous surge in new jobs and opportunities for our people. Each billion dollars that we add in exports means tens of thousands of new jobs.

More companies will seek the world of exports when they realize that government is not an adversary. It is your partner, and I do not mean, senior partner. We have eased, substantially, taxation of foreign-earned income, and introduced a 25 percent tax credit for research and development. We are, also, working to reform the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act,[6] not to weaken safeguards against bribery, but to remove disincentives that discourage legitimate business transactions overseas.

Another obstacle is export controls on technology. A backlog of two thousand applications greeted us when we arrived in office. We eliminated those and relaxed export controls on low technology items that do not jeopardize our national security. Still, there are limits I am sure each of you understand. We must avoid strengthening those who wish us ill by pursuing short-term profits at the expense of free-world security. Trade must serve the cause of freedom, not the foes of freedom.

To export more, we must do a better job promoting our products. We are strengthening our export credit programs by increasing the level of the Export-Import Bank ceiling on export guarantees. We are, also, designing a tax alternative to the Domestic International Sales Corporation that will fully maintain existing incentives to our exporters. We have begun a Commodity Credit Corporation blended export credit program for our farmers.[7] And that is in addition to the increases this year in the regular loan guarantee program for promoting U.S. farm exports.

[4] Reference is to H.R. 5133, "The Fair Practices in Automotive Products Act," introduced in the House of Representatives by Richard L. Ottinger on December 8, 1981. The bill, which established domestic content requirements for motor vehicles sold in the United States, was passed by the House but not the Senate during the 97th Congress.

To retain America's technological edge—of which there is no greater evidence than California's Silicon Valley—and to revive our leadership in manufacturing, we have implemented an R&D policy to enhance the competitiveness of U.S. industry in the world economy. In our 1984 budget, we have asked for significant increases for basic research. And we will seek to improve the teaching of science and mathematics in secondary schools, so tomorrow's work force can better contribute to economic growth. (Applause)

We will also seek to encourage greater and more creative interaction between university and industry scientists and engineers, through programs similar to the one between Hewlett Packard and Stanford University.

Finally, we're taking steps to encourage more industrial R&D through changes in our tax and antitrust policy; and we will attempt to remove legal impediments that prevent inventors of new technology from reaping the rewards of their discoveries.

Supporting American producers gives us the means to press our trading partners toward more free and open markets. We're challenging the unfair agricultural trade practices of Japan and the European Community. And we're charting a new course for the products of the future. We have agreed to a work program with the government of Japan to eliminate trade and investment barriers to high technology industries. We have also established a working group with the Japanese to actively explore opportunities for the development of abundant energy resources.

By restoring strength to our economy, enhancing the ability of our producers to compete, America is leading its trading partners toward renewed growth around the world. The world economy, like ours, has been through a wrenching experience: a decade of inflation, ballooning government spending and creeping constraints on productive enterprise. Other countries, including many of the developing countries, are now making major efforts to restrain inflation and restore growth. The United States applauds these efforts and we're working in the International Monetary Fund to keep a firm focus on the role of effective domestic policies in the growth and stability of the world economy.

But for all countries, international trade and financial flows are extremely important. Either the free world continues to move forward and sustain the postwar drive toward more open markets, or we risk sliding back to the tragic mistakes of the 1930's, when governments convinced themselves that bureaucrats could do it better than entrepreneurs. The choice we make affects not only our prosperity, but our peace and freedom. If we abandon the principle of limiting government intervention in the world economy, political conflicts will multiply and peace will suffer. That's no choice at all.

The United States will carry the banner for free trade and a responsible financial system. These were the great principles at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, in 1944, and they remain the core of U.S. policy. We will do so well aware of the changes that have occurred in the international trade and monetary system.

In trade, for example, we have practically eliminated the barriers which industrial countries maintain at the border on manufactured products. Today, tariffs among these countries average less than 5 percent. Our problems arise instead from non-tariff barriers which often reflect basic differences in domestic economic policies and structures among countries. These barriers are tougher to remove. We are determined to reduce government intervention as far as possible, and where that is unrealistic, to insist on limits to such intervention.

In trade with developing countries, on the other hand, tariffs and quotas still play a significant role. Here, the task is to find a way to integrate the developing countries into the liberal trading orders of lower tariffs and dismantled quotas. They must come to experience the full benefits and responsibilities of the system that has produced unprecedented prosperity among the industrial countries. We've taken the lead, proposing the Caribbean Basin Initiative to encourage poor and middle-income countries to trade more, and we proposed a North-South round of trade negotiations to maintain expanding trading opportunities for more advanced developing countries. We seek to build a collective partnership with all developing countries for peace, prosperity and democracy.

At the GATT ministerial meeting last November, the United States took the lead in resisting protectionism, strengthening existing institutions, and addressing the key trade issues of the future. While we're not totally satisfied with the outcome of that meeting, we'll continue in our support of free and equal trade opportunities for all countries.

Expanding trade is also the answer to our most pressing international financial problem—the mounting debt of many developing countries. Without the opportunity to export, debt-troubled countries will have difficulty servicing, and eventually reducing, their large debts. Meanwhile, the United States will support the efforts of the international financial community to provide adequate financing to sustain trade and to encourage developing countries in the efforts they are making to improve the basic elements of their domestic economic programs.

Earlier this week I forwarded draft legislation to the Congress for additional American support for the International Monetary Fund. [8] Leading by the IMF has a—or lending, I should say, has a direct impact on American jobs and supports continued leading—or lending by commercial institutions. If such lending were to stop, the consequences for the American economy would be very negative.

This spring, in May, the United States will host the annual Economic Summit of the major industrial countries in Williamsburg, Virginia. The leaders of the greatest democracies will have a quiet opportunity to discuss the critical issues of domestic and international economic policy and reflect on their individual and collective responsibilities to free peoples throughout the world. It's not a forum for decisionmaking. Each leader is responsible primarily to his or her own electorate. But by exchanging views, these leaders can gain a better understanding of how the future of their own people depends on that of others.

And may I just interject here, something brand new in international relations has been brought about by one Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher. When we sit around those summit tables, the protocol is gone and we're all on a first-name basis. And she saw to that.

I began today by saying that if we believe in our abilities and work together, we can make America the mightiest trading nation on earth. Here in this room, and not far from this building, are people and companies with the burning commitment that we need to make our country great. One of those companies, the Daisy Systems Corporation, is a computer firm in Sunnyvale, California. It was formed in August, 1980, and it made $7 million in sales its first shipping year. This year it expects to earn $25 million, and by 1986, $300 million. Daisy Corporation is already selling its products in the markets of France, Norway, Belgium, Great Britain, Germany, Israel, and Japan. Its workforce has nearly quadrupled in the last year.

Well, my dream for America, and I know it's one you share, is to take that kind of success story and multiply it by a million. We can do it. Albert Einstein told us, "Everything that is really great and inspiring is created by individuals who labor in freedom." With all the wisdom in our minds, and all the love in our hearts, let's give of ourselves and make these coming years the greatest America has ever known.

Thank you very much. And God bless you. (Applause) And God guide us all. (Applause)

Statement by the Secretary of Agriculture (Block) Before the House Agriculture Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee, April 7, 1983 [9]

U.S. Efforts To Reverse the Decline in Agriculture Exports

I would like to go through some written remarks here for the committees and then be prepared to answer any questions that you may have.

In opening I would like to say that I am pleased to have with me today Dick McCormack and Don Nelson. The Department of Agriculture is working very closely and I would say very harmoniously with both the State Department and the U.S. Trade Office on many issues involving agricultural trade.

In fact, Dick McCormack and I are just back from a trip to the Middle East, Tunisia, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and finally Turkey. I feel we did make some progress on that trip.

CHAIRMAN DE LA GARZA. Mr. Secretary, without objection your full statement [10] will appear in the record as well as those of the other two gentleman if they have prepared statements.

SECRETARY BLOCK. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I do appreciate the invitation to discuss with the two committees agricultural trade and the work of the Department of Agriculture to help increase exports of U.S. agricultural products.

This hearing is most timely. There has been a slowdown in agricultural exports that has given a special urgency to the Department's efforts to maintain and expand agricultural exports. At the same time pressures have mounted to turn away from our historical posture of liberal trade in agriculture, a position that has served our producers well, and move toward increasing Government intervention in the trade process.

So, I welcome this opportunity to discuss some of the initiatives that we have taken to move agricultural exports upward again and to reaffirm our commitment to the principles of freer trade as the best course for solid, sustainable growth in U.S. agricultural exports.

President Reagan's position on trade is clear—spelled out in his speech to the Nation's farm editors a year ago, [11] in his State of the Union message in January, [12] and most recently in his trade policy address in San Francisco. [13]

He has proposed a broad strategy in the field of international trade that increases the openness of the world trading system and is more fair to American farmers in the world marketplace. He has asked for new negotiating authority to remove barriers to get more of our products into foreign markets.

His objective is freer, more open world trade based on market forces, but with the recognition that, as he said in San Francisco "Free trade can only survive if all parties play by the same rules."

The President has taken significant actions to enhance agricultural trade. He lifted the Soviet grain embargo, and has sought aggressively to restore American agriculture's reputation as a reliable supplier.

He spelled out to the farm editors a clear agricultural export policy that has three essential priorities: One, restrictions will not be imposed on farm exports because of rising domestic prices; two, farm exports will not be singled out as an instrument of foreign policy; and three, world markets must be freed of trade barriers and unfair trade practices.

The administration trade policy objective is to preserve and extend the benefits of freer trade. This will require continued resistance to protectionist pressures at home while we continue to urge foreign governments to eliminate trade distorting policies.

The practices of some foreign governments pose extremely difficult issues for U.S. trade policy. The European Economic Community now engages in massive subsidized export action of agricultural products to dispose of the surpluses created by its high internal price-support program. Other countries, such as Japan, severely limit market access. These measures depress world prices of agricultural products, imposing substantial costs on U.S. producers in a sector where the United States holds a clear comparative advantage.

The United States traditionally seeks to induce other nations to move in the direction of freer trade and away from Government interference, and we will continue to do that. This policy has served this Nation and the agricultural economy well. U.S. farm exports tripled between 1971–1981—creating jobs and many other economic benefits.

We intend to continue to resist protectionism and other market distortions, but at the same time we are prepared to support and defend American agriculture's legitimate rights and interests in international trade.

We recognize our obligation as a government to do all that we can to give the efficient U.S. agricultural producer the opportunity to compete fairly in the world market, and we will fulfill that obligation.

The value of our agricultural exports is down—by close to $5 billion in fiscal year 1982 from the record $43.8 billion in fiscal year 1981, with indications of a further decline in the current year. While part of this decline is due to lower prices, export volume for most commodities is also down.

We share with the rest of the U.S. economy the negative effect on exports of the global recession and the strong dollar. But we also face some problems that are peculiar to agriculture: Our situation is aggravated by record world crops of grain and oilseeds, huge supplies in both importing and exporting countries, and by a number of special problems that affect our competitive position.

One important aspect of that current slump in exports is the fact that not only are U.S. agricultural export totals declining, the U.S. share of the world market also has turned down.

This is readily apparent in wheat and feed grains. Despite the fragile condition of the world economy, world wheat consumption and import demand have continued relatively strong. U.S. wheat exports, however, are declining sharply this year, after a large increase last year. In the absence of any efforts by the European Community to restrain subsidized exports, we project a decline in our wheat shipments in the neighborhood of 7 million tons for 1982–83, while those of our competitors are projected to increase by about 6 million tons.

World production and consumption of feed grains has also been increasing. However, production has been increasing faster than consumption for the past 2 years, and the level of world trade has dropped.

This has brought a decline in U.S. feed grain exports, as might be expected, from 72.4 million tons in 1980–81 to a projected 55.9 million tons this year. But we are losing not only because of lack of demand—we are losing to competition. The increase in shipments by other suppliers explains some of the U.S. decline in feed grain exports. The rest comes primarily from the drop in demand, particularly from the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe.

We are concerned, also, about the drop in exports for numerous other commodities including cotton, soybean meal and oil, rice, and poultry. Moreover, our share of the world cotton market, for example, fell from 40 to just over 30 percent from 1980 to 1982. Our meal and oil share went from 40 to 30 percent in 3 years and our broiler share is down by one-third.

There are many reasons for these export losses. The greatest adverse effects on our exports stem from a worldwide recession and a strong U.S. dollar overseas. Other reasons include the increased use of subsidies by competitor nations, and the continuing effect of the 1980 embargo on sales to the Soviet Union, when the U.S. share of the Soviet market for grain plunged from about 70 percent to less than 24 percent.

After President Reagan lifted the embargo in 1981, U.S. exports to the Soviet Union increased—reaching 13.9 million tons in fiscal 1982. This was an increase of more than two-fifths from the embargo level and close to the level of pre-embargo shipments. However, those 13.9 million tons still represented only 35 percent of the U.S.S.R. grain market last year.

And in the current year, the Soviet Union remains the single largest market for grains—more than doubling in size in 4 years—and U.S. farmers have lost that growth to competitor countries. The embargo stimulated production in those countries, and they have increased their sales to other markets as well as to the Soviet Union.

The decline of U.S. agricultural exports is a cause for serious concern. It means that we have serious competitive problems that prevent us from holding our own with other exporting countries.

Our projections for the next 2 years show that U.S. exports will continue to decline unless we act forcefully to restore our position.

We are streamlining and adapting the tools provided under our existing authorities to be more effective and to reverse the decline. We have taken new initiatives and are studying others to bolster U.S. agriculture's competitive ability.

We are especially interested in the results from the new ways in which we are using export credit, particularly the blended credit program.

This program was developed primarily to enhance U.S. export opportunities in those developing countries, which, as a group, were a leading growth market until the credit crunch sharply reduced their ability to buy. We felt blended credit would be an effective tool to facilitate import financing by these countries, offering prospects for immediate U.S. export sales, and laying the groundwork for long-term export growth.

The blended credit program uses Commodity Credit Corporation—(CCC)—GSM–5 direct credit and GSM–102 commercial export credit guarantees. Direct credit, offered interest-free, is combined with credit guarantees in a single package to produce an interest rate competitive with those offered by other suppliers. [14]

The blended credit program was announced last October 20 at $1.5 billion over 3 years. One hundred million dollars in direct, interest-free government credit was to be blended with at least $400 million in credit guarantees during fiscal 1983, with like amounts scheduled for each of the next 2 fiscal years.

The response from foreign governments in importing nations was immediate and enthusiastic which used up the original $500 million in less than 2 months. President Reagan followed with a January 11 allocation of $250 million more interest-free credit to be blended with at least $1 billion in credit guarantees to finance at least $1.25 billion in additional blended credit export sales during fiscal 1983.

One month after the announcement, the first credits were approved under the new program—for the sale of corn, rice, soybeans, and lumber to Jamaica.

The first $500 million of blended credit was allocated to eight countries. These included Morocco where, with blended credit and straight credit guarantees, we were able to supply virtually all of Morocco's wheat import requirements of almost 2 million tons. This is a market that has been dominated by subsidized wheat from France.

Another credit package, negotiated on the scene with the Yemen Arab Republic, allows that country to increase its imports of wheat and rice, giving U.S. agriculture 100 percent of those markets this year.

Another package opened the door for the United States to penetrate the new and growing Philippine market for soybean meal, and still another cleared the way for the first substantial sale of U.S. cotton to Yugoslavia in almost 15 years.

The response among importing countries to the second blended credit authorization has been equally positive, and the number of applications for its use insures that the entire amount will be used.

As of last week, blended credit had been allocated to finance the export sale of more than 7 million tons of U.S. agricultural products. They include wheat and wheat flour, corn, rice, cotton, soybeans and meal, tallow, tobacco, vegetable oil, eggs, semen, and lumber.

[14] Under current agricultural policy GSM–5 direct credit is seldom offered except in conjunction with GSM–102. When it is offered alone, it usually carries an interest rate set by the Commodity Credit Corporation. The purpose of the two credit programs is to increase U.S. agricultural exports by making it possible for foreign buyers to purchase U.S. commodities on affordable credit terms. The interest rate charged customers, either resulting from a blended credit mix or a rate set by the CCC, depends upon competing rates offered by other foreign exporters and the purchasing nation's economic circumstances.

We have also completed a supply agreement with Mexico, which I signed in February, using private export credit. Mr. Chairman, you were with us on that trip when we were in Mexico. It covers 6.2 million tons of U.S. corn, sorghum, soybeans and other commodities during 1983 and provides over $1 billion in U.S. credit guarantees to facilitate these sales.

This aggressive use of credit in new ways and with existing programs is important beyond the increases in export totals that have been generated. We are penetrating markets in the face of competitor export subsidies and helping our exporters into markets that, while currently suffering some financial constraints, offer good growth potential as conditions improve.

To meet our needs in this effort, the authorization for the GSM-102 program in fiscal year 1983 has been increased to $4.8 billion from $2.8 billion last fiscal year and when this Secretary of Agriculture came to office we had $2 billion. Now we have over $5 billion in total of guaranteed and direct credit.

We continue, of course, to use Public Law 480 [15] to support market expansion, and we made a special effort this fiscal year to speed up the programing of Public Law 480 Titles I/III. As a result, agreements signed during the first quarter of fiscal 1983 totaled $391 million, representing nearly 50 percent of total dollar allocations for the year. This is well above the 10-year average for this period and exceeds the dollar amount and the percentage signed for any of the 10 years.

In our budget request for fiscal 1984, we have asked for an increase of $13 million in the Title I/III sales over fiscal year 1983 to $872 million. This level of funding will provide long-term financing for about 3.7 million metric tons of commodity exports.

The committees are familiar with our efforts to negotiate an end to the use of subsidies by the European Community—subsidies that undercut market prices, erode U.S. markets, and absorb growth that would have gone to U.S. producers.

We have met with the Community four times since the GATT Ministerial last November failed to come to grips with the issue of agricultural export subsidies. While we are not necessarily confident that we can negotiate a satisfactory solution with the EC very soon, we will continue to make every effort to do so and at the same time continue policies that help us remain competitive.

The administration is committed to resolving this issue through negotiation, but meanwhile it is imperative—and only fair—that we do all that we can to defend our markets.

I have described our major efforts in this regard—blended credit, credit guarantees, and others—and I am pleased with their results.

The arrangement completed in January for the sale of 1 million tons of U.S. wheat flour to Egypt is a somewhat different type of arrangement and it is working out very well. This was a limited, selective action intended to make U.S. wheat flour competitive in price in the face of export subsidies of other nations.

In the past few years, the Egyptian market for flour imports has been dominated by the European Community through its use of export subsidies. We worked out an arrangement with the Egyptians that allowed us to supply that market through the creative use of CCC credit guarantees and competitive pricing. The package includes credit guarantees under GSM-102 along with a competitive price to be made possible through the awarding of CCC-owned wheat to American millers who bid successfully for the business. This is based on a negotiated price of $155 a ton delivered to Egypt.

The Egypt flour sale was possible under authorities of the Commodity Credit Corporation Charter Act, and we obviously could use those authorities again. We obviously can use them and we will use them again when we feel it is warranted.

We have made considerable use of existing authorities in ways that will increase our agricultural exports, especially in those areas where we face subsidized competition. We view some of these uses as only temporary, but we will continue to use them as necessary, and in each action we plan to meet the following criteria:

Selectivity. It must be targeted to selected countries—it would not be a general subsidy program.

Additionality. It would not displace other U.S. sales—cash, credit, or concessional.

Noninterference. It would not be trade disruptive—in other words, careful efforts would be taken to protect existing trade by those who do not use export subsidies.

Demand expansion. It would expand the demand base—not simply redistribute existing trade.

International rules. It would be consistent with our international obligations.

In summary, Mr. Chairman, agriculture is sharing with the rest of the economy the negative effects of global economic factors on trade, with the added impact of factors peculiar to agriculture—global overproduction and heavily subsidized competition.

We have acted to meet this challenge in innovative ways, spearheaded by new uses of credit that have generated significant export sales of a wide range of commodities. We have used a one-time arrangement to restore our position in a market that had been substantially eroded by subsidized competition, and we are prepared to act as necessary in the future to support what the President called "legitimate American interests and rights in world trade."

Our objective for American agriculture continues to be a world of freer trade in which producers compete on the basis of efficiency and quality, not Government decrees.

We will continue to press for negotiated solutions to the trade problems before us, and toward a recognition among trading partners that there is ultimately more to be gained than lost under a system of rational trade in agriculture.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Address by the U.S. Trade Representative (Brock) Before the National Press Club, May 4, 1983 [16]

The Case Against Protectionism

For too long now a worldwide recession has battered all of us, but some have suffered far more than others. Here in our own country, 11 million people remain out of work. The pain is real. It weaves through the fabric of our national life, forcing us to ask some difficult questions.

Are we less competitive as a nation than we once thought? Is it time to raise our economic drawbridge to the rest of the world and retreat into isolation? Or do we have the capacity to put our own house in order and seize the opportunity of new growth in new markets?

It is time to make a decision about ourselves and where we want to go. There are some facts which should go into such a decision.

The United States today is the most productive country in the world by any economic measure. Our political system is the freest, our enterprise system is the most competitive, and we have a deeply ingrained work ethic. No words could equal the picture of thousands lined up to apply for a few jobs when they are announced.

But the jobs are changing. In 1960, 37 percent of our workforce was employed in manufacturing. In 1970 it was 27 percent, in 1980, 22 percent, and in that latter year, only 11 or 12 percent were actually directly involved in production. During those 20 years, we did not produce less, we produced more—a lot more. But the jobs moved to small business, to services, informatics, and so on, and we did well. In the last decade alone, we created almost 20 million new jobs while our partners in Europe were creating 3 million.

At the same time, we absorbed the baby boom and the fantastic movement of women into the work force. We demonstrated anew the tremendous creativity, vitality, and flexibility of Americans.

Yet seeds were being sown for today's agony. Worldwide, nations turned to debt to ease the explosion of energy prices. More demands were placed on the capital pool, savings and profits declined, government shares of GNP increased, R&D fell, prices rose, productivity declined, and we found stagflation.

Well, here we are. What do we do now?

Increasingly politicians are tempted to close our doors against the blowing winds of world competition. It is a natural reaction. There is a basic rule of politics, "when things go wrong, find someone to blame, and be sure they can't vote in your district." Protectionism fills the bill nicely. Yet it is no answer.

We tried this approach in 1930, when under similar pressure, Congress passed the Smoot–Hawley tariff. Other countries, predictably, followed suit, turning a recession into the worst depression of the century.

We chose a different route because of this experience, in the post war period. We built a world system designed to open up markets and liberalize trade. It is inadequate to say that the GATT, the IMF, and similar agreements worked. Our trade went from $19 billion to $459 billion in 30 years.

Are we now to go back?

How can we explain protectionism to the millions who might lose their jobs?—for someone has to pay.

Unfortunately, such policies can only be described as no-growth, no-opportunity, and, sadly, no-hope.

So, to those who say we must resist such a temptation to slide into a spate of protectionist policies I say, "I believe." But, to those who say that the U.S. has been a paragon of virtue when it comes to government intervention in the marketplace, and adherence to the principles of free trade, I also say, "I believe (that is, unless we're talking about books, dairy products, tobacco, sugar, meat, textiles, peanuts, clothespins, and shipping to name the most obvious)."

To paraphrase an old truth, "None of us is without sin."

Having said that, it is important to point out that this President and this administration are committed to free trade and are going to take every possible step in that direction. Because we live in a real world, and an imperfect world, we cannot always run full-tilt, in a straight line. There will appear to be some stop-and-go, even a step backwards occasionally. However, one step backwards which allows you to soon move two steps ahead is sometimes the only choice available. The goal is not going to change, and this country's leadership in promoting a more open world trading system is not going to change. When we improve the trading system, we improve economic opportunity for all nations. We create millions of new jobs and billions in new revenues in the process.

Now, more than ever in our history, the United States has more at stake, and more to gain, from an open, expanding international trading system. So let's go back to a few facts.

—Trade as a share of our GNP has doubled in the last 10 years.

—Forty percent of our farm acreage is now planted for export. Incredibly, we plant more acres for export to Japan than Japan has acres.

—In addition, we export more services than we import and we export more agricultural products than we import. We exported $140 billion worth of manufactured exports alone.

Our biggest import item, obviously, is oil. So when you hear of a $43 billion merchandise trade deficit, in 1982, remember that $63 billion worth of imported oil is being counted on the negative side. In terms of the goods and services which people produce, in other words, where the jobs are, this nation is a solid competitor.

Four of five new jobs created between 1977 and 1980 were export related. Increasingly, American firms and workers are accepting the challenge of doing business internationally. With 30–40,000 jobs created per $1 billion in exports, it has certainly paid off.

Still, it seems almost every person who enters my office starts out with the phrase "I'm for free trade, but . . ." and then goes on to seek protection in one form or another, from foreign competition.

In fairness, let's make a distinction between fair trade and protectionism. Under U.S. and international rules, there are cases when certain actions are not only acceptable, but ethically and legally right. These actions, taken in accordance with domestic and international law, must not be confused with protectionism. I'm specifically referring to actions taken by this government in response to unfair trade practices of other nations. In a less than perfect world, it is ethically and economically mandatory for the government to ensure that Americans are not unfairly deprived of their jobs by the intervention by governments of other nations.

In the dialog in the news media, the corporate board rooms, the union halls, this fundamental point is often neglected. I will say it again. Defending American firms and workers from unfair and predatory foreign practices is not protectionism.

However, our target must be unfair competition—not imports in general. Imports do provide needed competition for our domestic producers, and more choice and lower prices for our consumers. They also symbolize what we are just recently learning to accept. That is, that we are living in an interdependent world. We all have to learn to accept that, it's a part of growing up.

In times of recession and high unemployment, some might describe this openness regarding imports as enlightened. Others might describe it as naive. It had better, in truth, be pragmatic—pragmatic because one country's imports are another's exports; more precisely, American exports are someone else's imports. Our exports represent millions of American jobs and the potential for millions more. A surge of anti-import sentiment could cost everyone, especially us.

That brings me to the next key point. Aren't there already some rather severe trade barriers to our goods and services? What about the ability of American firms to gain access to foreign markets? And what about foreign governments that subsidize their exports into the U.S. market?

Yes, there are serious barriers already in place. And, some governments do subsidize their exports. Our policy is aimed at removing those barriers and reducing export subsidies. But, in the absence of measurable progress, we are faced with a dilemma. If we continue to negotiate without tangible results, we will ultimately lose the existing base of support for freer trade. A perception would exist that our trading partners refuse to play by the same rules as we do. And they have refused, in far too many cases. If, on the other hand, we retaliate blindly, we face the prospect of ultimately doing less business rather than more because of increased restrictions on both sides.

The fact of the matter is that while less international trade would certainly not be in our best interest, we'd survive. Others might not be so fortunate. Therefore, our first course is to negotiate. We have done this. In many areas the time for talking has run out. Our second is to bring this matter to a head through international dispute settlement proceedings. We have a number of good cases now being pursued. Our last course is to selectively and surgically respond to the actions of the offending country. We finally had to do this in some areas, but this is a sword better kept in a scabbard, lest we be tempted to excess, and escalation to the good of no one!

Yet, while the national trade debate has centered upon our relationships with our developed trading partners, our brightest market opportunity for the future is the developing world. We import half of all the manufactured products of less developed nations worldwide, and export more merchandise to them than to Europe and Japan combined.

While the economies of the industrialized nations were certainly ravaged by the OPEC price increases of the 1970's, even more victimized were the economies of the developing world. With the current oil glut, and its falling prices, there is now a slightly increased opportunity for many LDC's such as Brazil and Argentina to recover. Some, however, will continue to have serious problems for a long time to come. In neither case, will recovery occur overnight.

Here at home most of us believe the United States has turned the economic corner. Most LDC's have not, and may not for years. Yet, their well-being is important to us. They must have an opportunity to earn foreign exchange from exports. That simply cannot be done if protectionism takes root in the advanced nations, as so many now advocate. Only if the developed world maintains open markets will the LDC's be able to sell their products, pay their debts, and keep alive their hope for economic recovery and future growth.

The United States will do so, and we ask our partners in the industrial world to do so as well. Such action, if shared by all, can do much to restore confidence, stability, and real growth to a battered global economy.

Simply stated, it is our policy to strengthen the global competitive opportunity for U.S. firms and workers, to ensure that U.S. firms and workers are not unfairly disadvantaged by predatory actions of our trading partners, and to forge a multilateral trade framework for the further expansion of world trade.

With all of this, the true test of our ability to compete, to grow, to create the jobs and income this nation must have, will be right here at home. We cannot prosper internationally if we are unhealthy domestically. We have to control our deficits—now. We have to build the kind of country that competes with mind and motivation, as well as muscle. And we must be willing to adapt to a new economic world. To maintain our competitive position in the world economy, we must continually adjust what we produce and what we export in response to market forces. In exceptional cases, where rapid increases in imports outpace the capacity of our economy to adjust, and threaten to injure U.S. producers, the government is obligated to ease the adjustment problems of dislocated firms and workers as provided in U.S. trade laws.

However, we've got to realize that efforts to deflect or stop the adjustment process would, if successful, mortgage our future and that of our children and grandchildren to an outmoded, unproductive, and inflationary economy. We would run the grave risk of falling far behind those nations which have the foresight and discipline to successfully navigate their way through the rapidly changing world economy. More is required. We Americans have always believed in the paramount virtues of education. We must move increasingly to on-going, lifetime education to reduce the structural unemployment which results from the mismatch between current labor skills and new employment requirements. This mismatch aggravates unemployment and reduces overall growth potential.

Education weaves through any disc sion of productivity, of a technolog revolution, of adjustment.

Edmund Burke once said "Educatio the cheap defense of nations." It is the best hope for our future. It is the hope for improved productivity, bo jobs, more income and higher growth.

Why then do we tolerate an Amer educational system in decline? Sur have shown that 13 percent of all 15-y old high school students in America c not perform reading tasks designate "functional," 28 percent could not an questions testing "literal comprehens of what they read, and 10 percent c not write prose deemed marginally ac able. One half of all U.S. high schoo dents do not study math or sc beyond the tenth grade. Only one i American students is studying phy one in twelve is studying calculus amazing 53 percent could not wr letter, and could not solve simple lems involving applied math. Incre this survey did not include the 26 p that had dropped out of high school

Compare that with Japan. Ther percent of Japanese teenagers gr from high school as opposed to 7 cent in the United States. Japanes dents are in session 5 1/2 days pe with more weeks to the school yea U.S. schools.

The result is that the graduate of anese high school accrues approxim more full years of total primary a ondary education than the U.S school graduate.

The great accomplishment of th nese education system lies not in ation of a brilliant elite, but rath generation of such a high average capability.

If the next generation of Ame to make informed decisions ab complex issues facing our demo they are to have the tools of the m essary for innovation and creativi workplace, if they are to control t destiny, we must exercise the l leadership now, all of us—busines state government, national gov parent, teacher—all of us.

It may seem strange that inte trade forces us to face domestic like education and deficits, work rules and management practices, but it does, and we must. If we accept the challenge to put our own house in order, to compare, this fortunate country of ours is going to offer our children an opportunity beyond our wildest dreams, and that is worth any ounce of our national will and effort.

Statement by President Reagan, June 1, 1983 [17]

The Proposed Department of International Trade and Industry

In recent years, international trade has become increasingly central to the American economy. Today, one of every eight American manufacturing jobs is related to exports. Every billion dollars in exports supports 25,000 jobs.

I am proud of the team we have brought to Washington to work on trade issues. We have come to believe through our experience that the executive branch can—and should—be better organized to tackle the issues on this front.

Today I am pleased to announce plans that would place responsibility for both trade policymaking and implementation in a single department.

This new department can not only provide a leaner, more efficient, better coordinated approach to international trade but can also help us in achieving many key objectives:

—A healthy and open system of international trade;

—Expansion of U.S. exports;

—Reduction of overseas barriers so that American firms can compete more effectively abroad;

—Encouragement of the private sector to seek out more opportunities overseas;

—And of great importance, insurance that America speaks with a strong, unified voice in trade and industrial matters.

I urge the Congress to enact this plan into law as swiftly as possible.

Testimony by the U.S. Trade Representative (Brock) Before the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, June 24, 1983 [18]

In Support of the Trade Reorganization Proposal

I will be very brief. I will not read my statement, Mr. Chairman, simply because I am not supposed to do a lot of that right at the moment.

I appreciate the chance to be with you today to discuss and to support the President's reorganization proposal and the Roth bill [19] as presented to this committee and the Senate.

I would like to state at the outset that we are very fortunate to have the leadership of President Reagan on this issue, not only in the area of trade policy, but in all areas of critical importance to this country's economic, social, and security interests. I take exception with those who say that this country speaks with two or more voices on trade policy. [20] There is now, [18] Source: Trade Reorganization Act of 1983: Hearings Before the Committee on Governmental Affairs, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session on S. 121 (Washington, 1984), pp. 285–287. Chairman of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee William V. Roth, Jr. presided over the session.

[19] Senator Roth, Chairman of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, introduced the trade reorganization bill (S.121) in the Senate on January 26, 1983.

[20] Following Ambassador Brock's initial testimony before the committee on March 17, 1983, Senator Roth characterized the current division of authority between the U.S. Trade Representative and the Secretary of Commerce as a "two headed monster" neither one of whom could "speak as the principal officer on trade." See Trade Reorganization Act of 1983, p. 20.

and will continue to be only one voice on trade policy and that is the voice of the President of the United States.

It is and it has to be. Anybody that has doubts about that should pay attention to what was said at the summit in Williamsburg. A very clear statement on what is necessary in world trade circles was made by those governments at the urging of President Reagan. It was a significant step forward.

It is important, Mr. Chairman, without going into the details of the legislation to look at a couple of aspects of the reorganization proposal.

In effect we are taking the trade functions of the U.S. Trade Representative and merging them with those elements presently in the Commerce Department that are primarily trade related and thus, creating a new Cabinet department. I think if we are going to undertake a reorganization, we have to understand a bit about the genesis of the present style of operation and why and what we must maintain in order to be sure that the process works in the future.

When we passed in 1962 the Trade Expansion Act providing for a Special Representative for Trade Negotiations,[21] the STR, we created an office with a very narrow description, and limited authority. Over the last 20 years that description and authority has grown substantially, culminating in the most recent reorganization plan No. 3, which was adopted in 1979.[22]

The Office is in charge of the establishment and coordination of our trade policy as well as trade negotiations. I chair the Interagency Coordinating Committee, the Trade Policy Committee, which is a statutory committee. Interestingly, while I am required to consider all agencies' views, I am not required to accept the advice. This is an explicit statement in the law because somebody has to make a final recommendation to the President. I think what we are seeking with this new reorganization is precisely that same logic.

I want to be sure that people understand that the proposal before this body incorporates a very strong interagency process without which the system simply will not work, but ultimately one person has to make that final recommendation and I hope this ethic presently in the law will be carried forward in whatever form it takes. It is fundamentally important to do so.

I grant you that we play the role of honest broker. A recent Harvard Business Review article stated that the intended purpose of the STR is to "collect, balance and compose those several interests into a coherent U.S. policy." I hope and believe that the new proposal is intended to strengthen that precise role.

If you look at the new department which is going to be called DITI—

SENATOR COHEN. Did you say ET?

MR. BROCK. I think ET might be better. I don't like DITI. (Laughter.)

But that is the way this town works. We like these initial agencies. It would, as I said, merge the functions of the USTR, and the trade-related economic and industry advocate offices of the Department of Commerce into a single Cabinet-level department.

The core would be our present 131 employees in USTR, complemented by the 7,400 employees of Commerce. (Laughter.)

I do think that what we are seeking is in all sincerity a coordination and merging of these two groups both of which have strengths that can be added nicely to the process. The new agency then would represent and promote American economic interests. Obviously this has much broader application than "industrial" interests. We are presently involved in trying at GATT to incorporate certain things into its encompassing agreements.

We are presently working on bilateral investment treaties with other countries. So services, investment, all areas of economic activity will be supported by this new office. It would obviously seek to expand our exports and enhance our competitive circumstances.

Let me just conclude with two fundamentally important points of emphasis. I mentioned the interagency process.

Mr. Chairman, there simply is no way you, I, or anybody else can write a bill that would put every single trade function into one department. It cannot be done. Even if we put all of the legal functions into one department, never in the foreseeable future of this country could we write any kind of program which would eliminate the legitimate interests of the State Department in what happens in trade relations with other countries, or the Treasury Department, Department of Labor, a number of other Government agencies, and the Agriculture Department of course.

So it is important and fundamentally so that this program be designed to be sure that those interests are represented and reflected in the policymaking process. That is a basic central theme of any truly effective agency. I don't think there is a disagreement among Mac and myself and Agriculture and other agencies that have discussed it. That is what our intention is and that is what we expect and beheve we can achieve.

Second, I would commend to you one of the present day strengths of the small office which I have the privilege to head, the U.S. Trade Representative Office, is the private sector involvement.

Mr. Chairman, when you have 131 people and that is all, you are dependent on others to get adequate and up-to-date information. Our private sector, our labor unions, our management, are competing around the world every day and in every field. They know more about what is going on than anybody else ever could and they have it at their fingertips right now.

One of the fundamentally essential components of my present job is the private sector advisory system. We don't just talk to advisers. We more importantly listen. I commend to you that system as one which the Congress simply must insure continues and hopefully even strengthen it if that is possible because I don't believe any Government agency can operate in isolation from those that it is supposed to serve. You must incorporate the private sector and put them into this kind of an apparatus.

CHAIRMAN ROTH. Ambassador, if I may interrupt, you may recall that when I served on the Finance Committee in 1974 trade legislation came before the committee. Because of my support for a private sector advisory system, I introduced the amendment that permits the private sector—both business and labor—to directly advise the USTR in the negotiations. So I strongly agree with what you are saying.

MR. BROCK. Mr. Chairman, I am preaching to the choir when you are here but I am hoping that others listen. (Laughter.)

I know of your interest. I just state it for the public record because I do think it is awfully, awfully important that throughout this debate on reorganization we keep that concept in mind, that the private sector can make this process work and without it it simply will not be as effective as it ought to be in this country's well-being.

That is a sufficient statement of the present need. I think the proposal can offer us an opportunity for more close, more effective coordination within the Government. I think it can reduce some of the present competitive problems that we have seen over the last few years and I think it is a good step forward.

GSP: An Economic Advantage for the United States

Let me summarize briefly. [24] We are all familiar with the general purposes of the GSP. [25] It was at the outset intended to [25] The Generalized System of Preferences (GSP), approved by GATT in 1971, authorized developed nations to extend preferential tariff treatment to developing countries in order to assist the economic development of the world's poorer countries by encouraging greater diversification and expansion of their production and exports.

I want to say today at the outset that this is not an altruistic program, but in fact is very much in the interest of not just the poor developing countries of the world, but of the United States and our own economic well being. We cannot overestimate the importance of the growth and development of poorer countries to the United States. The LDC's now purchase 40 percent of all that we export, more than Europe and Japan combined. They have become and remain the fastest growing markets for our products. Their annual rate of growth has been 12.5 percent since 1976, which is an absolutely spectacular rate of growth which I would imagine any company in the United States or our economy as a whole would welcome.

Now, that is in contrast with 9 1/2-percent growth in exports to our traditional developed country markets. GSP has contributed to this growth by enabling those developing countries to earn increased foreign exchange which they have used to purchase U.S. goods and services. In so many words, GSP has spurred this expansion of trade both ways, not through costly one-way grants of aid, but through a system that encourages broad-based, sustained economic growth founded on the marketplace. In other words, GSP is not a development project. Rather, it is a system of opportunities which encourages developing countries to draw and build upon their own relative strengths.

It is important to remember during the debate that GSP imports do not represent a threat to our own economic interests. While these imports have increased from $3 to $8.4 billion during the life of the GSP program and cover 3,000 products, a study by the ITC determined that GSP imports have not had an appreciable effect on the U.S. market. These imports have been averaging one half of a percent or less of U.S. consumption.

While the program has had no adverse effect at the macro level, it is important to recognize that particular products at times may feel some impact of GSP imports. We have been responsive to these problems. Through our annual product review procedures, we have tailored the coverage to reflect changing conditions of competition and any resultant changes in import sensitivity. In this regard, I believe that our product review has been very responsive to the concerns of U.S. producers and workers.

Many have noted with concern the fact that a limited number of GPS [GSP] beneficiary countries have accounted for the majority of the program's benefits. This has occurred despite the operation of the program's competitive need limits, which have automatically excluded almost one-half of these top beneficiaries' trade from GSP eligibility.

In response to these concerns, and in keeping with our desire to integrate developing countries more fully into the international trading system, the administration strengthened its graduation policy[26] in 1981. This action resulted in the removal of over $1 billion in GSP benefits from the leading beneficiaries of the program in addition to the previously established statutory competitive need exclusions which now total over $7 billion annually.

Let me note one additional fact before going to the new program: 19 other industrialized countries have found it in their interest to extend their own GSP program through 1990 or beyond.

We have sent to you a bill to renew the GSP program. I believe it represents a fair and balanced response to the legitimate interest of the GSP beneficiary countries and domestic workers and producers, many of whom have shared with us their views on the program's current operation and continuation.

We ask that you extend the GSP for a 10-year period. Further, we ask that the statutory authority for the program be modified in certain aspects in response to two general trends, first, the increasing competitiveness of many GSP products, and second, the increasing importance of developing country markets and U.S. exports.

stimulate LDC growth. For further historical background on the evolution of the GSP, see infra.

[26] The so-called graduation policy refers to the process by which a developing country loses its eligibility for special treatment under GSP or other concessional programs because of its economic progress.

We propose that graduation be made even more explicit through the establishment of lower competitive need limits for highly competitive products. These limits which would be set at 25 percent of the value of total U.S. imports of any GSP eligible product and $25 million worth of imports of any GSP eligible product, would be applied to products in which a country was found to be highly competitive after a general product review.

In this review, the President would consider the various factors required under current statutory and administrative procedures. One of these factors involves the extent to which a GSP beneficiary country has assured the United States of reasonable and equitable access to its markets. This factor will be considered not only with respect to the limitation of the benefits through the application of lower competitive need limits, but also with respect to a liberalization of benefits on certain products.

The administration proposes that the statute allow for the liberalization of competitive need limits on various products as a means of further inducing beneficiaries to provide significant access to their markets. In its market access considerations, we will examine not only GSP beneficiary country tariff and nontariff barriers to trade in goods and services, but also other trade restricting practices, such as performance requirements and inadequate protection of intellectual property rights.

In recent years, we have received an increasing number of complaints about such LCD [LDC] barriers. Significant additional market opportunities exist for the U.S. exports to many key developing country markets. We need to tap this potential.

It is clear that the United States has much to gain from a GSP program restructured to help induce beneficiaries to liberalize their markets in a manner commensurate with their level of development.

Before concluding, I ask that you keep in mind the special needs of the least developed beneficiaries, a group of approximately 30 of the world's poorest countries. These countries do not possess resources and infrastructure required to export most of the products eligible for GSP treatment, and thus have often failed to realize appreciable benefit from the program.

Furthermore, in some instances they have been excluded from GSP treatment on eligible products because of the statutory competitive need limits. The administration requests that the President be authorized to waive competitive need limits applicable to products of least developed countries as a small but important step toward assisting their development process.

The GSP program has provided important opportunities for developing countries to diversify and expand their economies. This has been achieved without any significant adverse impact on the U.S. economy in terms of production, employment, or balance of payments. In fact, GSP duty-free imports have accounted for no more than 3 percent of total U.S. imports since the program began.

We have before us the opportunity to extend this GSP program in a manner that will further not only the program's laudable development objectives, but also the export goals of the U.S. producers. Operation of the GSP by the United States and other industrialized countries has demonstrated and will continue to demonstrate that trade can be an effective force for world economic growth.

I thank you for the opportunity to testify, Mr. Chairman.

GSP: A Vital Element in U.S.–Third World Relations

I have submitted to you a statement [28] which I will cover only a part of.

[27] Source: Possible Renewal of the Generalized System of Preferences Part I, pp. 8–10.

MR. DAM. Thank you.

Ambassador Brock has covered the proposal that we have submitted to you, and many of the economic interests we have involved.[29] I would like to emphasize some of the foreign policy aspects.

As he said, the United States does not act alone in providing duty-free entry to products from developing countries. Nine years ago, during the debate of the Trade Act of 1974,[30] which authorized our GSP program, the administration pointed out that in the area of international trade our approach has been to act in concert with all major trading nations, and that is true today. All of our industrial partners recognize that steps are required to expand the flow of trade between developed and developing countries. The need for positive action to open world markets for exports from developing countries has long been recognized. The GATT contract included in part 4 of GATT calls for such action by the developed country members.

Thereafter, in the late 1960's, we and other developed OECD member countries agreed to institute preferential treatment for developing country exports. In 1971, the GATT contracting parties agreed to waive for 10 years the most-favored-nation requirement of GATT to the extent necessary to permit such preferential treatment. The legal basis for GSP under GATT has been incorporated in the GATT agreements on the framework for the conduct of international trade negotiated in the Tokyo Round of the late 1970's.[31]

By 1976, with the inception of GSP in the United States, 19 OECD members were granting preferences to developing countries. If we look at the OECD programs in the aggregate, we see 41 percent of developing country imports enter these markets duty-free. An additional 18 percent of developing country imports are eligible for either duty-free treatment or for duty reductions under the various national GSP programs.

Our OECD partners are committed to a continuation of GSP. With the exception of the United States and Canada, OECD donors have either already renewed their programs into the 1990's or have open-ended programs with no expiration date. The European Community and Japan, which along with the United States provide over 85 percent of global GSP benefits, have already extended their GSP programs for a second decade. Canada is expected to renew its program by July of next year. The European Community in particular has indicated the importance it attaches to a continuation of the United States GSP program as a form of burden sharing.

There is good reason why we and the OECD countries have supported GSP programs. GSP is the major trade instrument designed to help developing countries help themselves. GSP increases developing country access to developed country markets, thereby expanding developing country export earnings, accelerating their growth, and strengthening their ability to meet international financial obligations. At the same time, the United States will benefit, for a large share of developing country export earnings return to the United States in the form of additional purchases here.

Mr. Chairman, I could analyze further the beneficial linkage between increased imports for developing countries and growth and prosperity in the U.S. economy. Ambassador Brock, however, has already cogently covered the economics of GSP. Let me turn more broadly to the foreign policy aspects.

First of all, GSP is an integral part of our overall effort to encourage self-reliant economic development through trade, not aid. As I said at the recent UNCTAD meeting in Belgrade,[32] for all countries, trade is the dominant source of external resources, and for developing countries trade is the dominant impetus to growth. GSP renewal is an essential element of the program I outlined in Belgrade to increase trade, promote growth, and provide a foundation for the resolution of many of our present problems.

Second, GSP has been the only trade policy instrument we have which is specifically intended to increase the access of developing countries toward our markets. The beneficiary countries view GSP renewal as an important indicator of the seriousness with which the U.S. views its stated policy of encouraging self-sufficient economic development.

Third, by promoting export earnings, a renewed GSP program will enable developing countries to adopt more outward looking economic policies, contributing to the U.S objective of improving and maintaining the global economic system.

The GSP is an effective way of demonstrating to the developing world the benefits of preserving free and open markets.

Fourth, GSP plays a significant role in promoting the economic well-being and security of developing countries such as the ASEAN nations [33] which are vital to our national security. In 1982, U.S. trade with ASEAN topped $20 billion. Our exports to ASEAN as a whole nearly equaled our exports to the United Kingdom, our fourth largest export market. A key to ASEAN's economic success and to its importance as a market for U.S. exports is its ability to sell to us. GSP preferences coupled with our relatively open markets have helped significantly. Since the inception of the program, ASEAN's GSP shipments to the United States have grown impressively from $167 million in 1976 to $814 million in 1982, an annual growth rate of 30 percent.

Singapore, Thailand, and the Philippines, all of which are key to our regional security interests in Southeast Asia, are ranked among the top 15 beneficiaries of GSP.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, renewal of GSP is consistent with the Williamsburg commitment to "take into account and exploit relationships between growth, trade, and finance in order that recovery may spread to all countries, developed and developing alike." [34] We realize that GSP is a relatively small instrument in our trade policy tool kit. In 1982, the value of GSP imports amounted to only 3.4 percent of the value of total U.S. imports, and slightly over 8 percent of the value of imports from developing countries.

Nevertheless, failure to renew the program would have high political cost. The developing countries will see it as a signal of U.S. indifference to their problems, and as a rebuff of their efforts to develop through expanded trade. Our developed country partners would view our failure to renew as evidence that the United States is no longer willing to do its part in the shared task of contributing to world development.

In short, Mr. Chairman, we see GSP renewal as essential to our North-South relations and to our relations with our major industrial trading partners. By preserving open markets and expanding trade with developing countries, we and other industrial nations will nurture Third World economic growth even as economic recovery in the West proceeds and strengthens over the coming years.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

International Trade: The Key to Peace and Economic Progress

My fellow Americans, I'd like to talk to you today about trade—a powerful force for progress and peace as you well know. The winds and waters of commerce carry opportunities that help nations grow and bring citizens of the world closer together. Put simply, increased trade spells more jobs, higher earnings, better products, less inflation and cooperation over confrontation. The freer the flow of world trade the stronger the tides for economic progress and peace among nations.

I've seen in my lifetime what happens when leaders forget these timeless principles. They seek to protect industries and jobs but they end up doing the opposite. One economic lesson of the 1930's is protectionism increases international tensions. We bought less from our trading partners but then they bought less from us. Economic growth dried up. World trade contracted by over 60 percent and we had the Great Depression. Young Americans soon followed the American flag into World War II.

No one wants to relive that nightmare and we don't have to. The 1980's can be a time when our economies grow together and more jobs will be created for all. This was the spirit of the Williamsburg Summit in May. The leaders of the industrialized countries pledged to continue working for a more open trading system. But sometimes that's easier said than done.

Take the case of our own economy. Things are looking up for America. Inflation has been knocked down to 2.6 percent. Economic growth in the second quarter reached 8.7 percent and one million seven hundred thousand Americans have been hired since last December.

Yesterday we learned that total unemployment has dropped to 9.3 percent. Nearly 500,000 of our fellow citizens found jobs in July. More Americans are working than any time in this nation's history. This good news restores confidence in our economy and our currency.

Some people dislike our strong dollar and blame it on our interest rates. We do not want disorderly currency markets and we've intervened to bring back order to otherwise disorderly markets. But let's remember something. Other countries have higher interest rates than we do, yet their currencies have fallen in relation to ours. One good reason is inflation. It's not the interest you earn from holding a currency that matters most. It's the confidence you have that the value of your money won't depreciate from higher inflation. America's inflation rate has declined dramatically.

Now, a strong dollar makes our purchases from abroad less expensive. And that's good.

Winning the war against inflation is probably the best economic legacy we could leave to the next generation. Remember what life was like only a few years ago when the value of the dollar was being talked down and inflation was going through the roof? But a strong dollar also brings problems.

It makes the goods our exporters are trying to sell more expensive. Still, we're tough competitors. Some $200 billion worth of goods were sold by Americans last year. So, do we listen to those who would go back to dead-end protectionism and to sabotaging the value of our currency or do we go forward, keeping our faith in the American people who made this nation the greatest success story the world has ever known?

I believe our challenge is to marshal the power of this country's best minds and create the technology that will restore America's economic leadership. I have appointed a Presidential Commission on Industrial Competitiveness,[36] asking distinguished leaders from business, labor and academia to advise us on how best to strengthen our ability to compete in world markets.

We believe the U.S. trade position would be strengthened by uniting many of this government's trade responsibilities under one roof. So, we proposed legislation to create a department of international trade and industry.[37] We're also taking action to create opportunities for trade.

Ten days ago, our negotiators reached a new, long-term grain agreement with the Soviet Union.[38] Since 1981, we've ended the unfair embargo that had been slapped on American farmers. And now we have an agreement that obligates the Soviets to increase their minimum purchase of wheat or grain, I should say, by 50 percent.

This, along with the likelihood of substantial purchases from China, represents a major step forward for our farmers. It symbolizes our determination to help them regain the markets they lost. It also proves that, while we oppose Soviet aggression, we seek to promote progress and peace between our peoples.

Yesterday, I signed legislation to stimulate more trade and opportunity—the Caribbean Basin Initiative.[39] This package of incentives will establish new commercial relationships between the people of the Caribbean and the United States. Stimulating trade will mean new jobs for their citizens as well as ours.

It underscores our belief that economic development based on free market principles is the key to helping our neighbors build a future of freedom, democracy and peace.

Letter From President Reagan to the Speaker of the House of Representatives (O'Neill), March 2, 1983 [1]

The Need For an Increase in U.S. Support for the International Monetary Fund and the General Arrangements To Borrow

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I transmit herewith a draft bill "to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act [2] to authorize consent to and authorize appropriations for an increase in the United States quota in the International Monetary Fund and to authorize appropriations for increased U.S. participation in the General Arrangements to Borrow."

The proposed bill would authorize an increase of SDR 5,310.8 million (approximately $5.8 billion at current exchange rates) in the United States quota in the International Monetary Fund (IMF), to the level of about SDR 17.9 billion; and an increase of approximately $2.7 billion in U.S. participation in the IMF's General Arrangements to Borrow (GAB), to a new total of SDR 4,250 million. These proposed increases are part of an overall expansion of IMF quotas totaling about SDR 28.9 billion and an expansion of the GAB totaling about SDR 10.6 billion.

These measures are required now because the world economy faces economic and financial problems which are without precedent in the postwar era. There is a natural tendency in time of recession, high unemployment and international economic uncertainty toward protectionism and financial contraction—reactions which were the seeds of the depression of the 1930s. The International Monetary Fund was created in the aftermath of World War II, largely at the initiative of the United States, to provide a constructive counter to those tendencies and prevent a recurrence of the slide into world depression.

The IMF remains the centerpiece of international efforts to deal with these problems in an orderly and constructive way, by supporting its members' efforts to correct their balance of payments problems through adoption of sound economic policies. However, the IMF's resources are under serious strain. Its ability to commit the medium-term financing necessary to allow member countries time to implement corrective economic policies is likely to be exhausted during the course of 1983 or early 1984. It is essential that the IMF have adequate resources to fulfill its vital responsibilities. Failure to resolve current world economic and financial difficulties in an orderly manner would result in a downward spiral of world trade and billions of dollars in simultaneous loan losses. This would pose a fundamental threat to the international economic system, and to the U.S. economy. Prospects for the economic recovery and expansion necessary to generate new jobs would be dashed, not only in the United States, but around the world.

I therefore strongly recommend prompt enactment of legislation to give effect to the proposed increase in the United States quota in the IMF and to the proposed increase in United States participation in the IMF's General Arrangements to Borrow.

The world's current economic problems are attributable to several factors, including the rapid inflation of the 1970s, the twin oil "shocks" of that decade, high interest rates, the worldwide recession, and countries' failure to adjust to a rapidly changing world economic environment. These developments led to a very rapid rise in international lending and a build-up in external debt which in some cases, particularly in a period when inflation is being brought under control, are no longer sustainable. Major borrowers abroad are finding it extraordinarily difficult to find the financing needed to sustain economic activity, purchase essential imports, and service their external debts. As a consequence, important segments of the United States' economy and financial system, and a number of countries of critical importance to America's national interests, are in a vulnerable position. The health of the United States economy and the well-being of its citizens are tied directly to the recovery and growth of other nations. Our own self-interests, therefore, demand that we demonstrate the leadership required to assure an orderly transition in a turbulent world environment.

The dependence of the United States on the world economy has grown rapidly. Today, nearly 20 percent of total U.S. goods produced are exported abroad. Some 40 percent of our agricultural production is exported. U.S. banks account for about one-third of total international bank lending, and they rely heavily on foreign sources for loanable funds. All told, more than 5 million U.S. jobs depend on exports, and those jobs in turn depend on healthy markets abroad. Foreign trade accounted for four out of every five new jobs in U.S. manufactures in the late 1970s. Our services trade surplus grew more than elevenfold between 1970 and 1980. Our surplus in high technology trade has increased from $7.6 billion to $30 billion in that period. Combining goods and services, estimates show that one-third of U.S. corporate profits derive from international activities. Going one step further, our trade relationships with the developing countries have expanded even more rapidly than our overall trade. In the last few years, trade with LDCs has accounted for nearly 40 percent of the overall growth of American exports.

Clearly, the United States has a major direct interest in assuring a strong world economy and a smoothly functioning international monetary system. Conversely, sharp cutbacks in imports by borrowing countries, necessitated by economic collapse or inadequate financing, would have a direct and damaging impact on not only our financial system but on American workers, farmers, manufacturers and investors. On the banking side, sudden losses on foreign loans would squeeze earnings and capital positions. This in turn would impair banks' ability to finance world trade and could lead both to a reduction in their ability to lend to domestic customers and to higher interest rates.

The IMF plays a key role in helping its member countries make the economic adjustments needed to correct their economic problems and restore their creditworthiness in the world marketplace—adjustments at the national level which are the essential ingredient of a sound international economy. The IMF also provides strong support for a more open trade environment through economic programs which emphasize reliance on market-oriented economic policies.

The proposed increase in IMF resources is one part of a comprehensive strategy to resolve current world economic problems. This strategy involves adoption of sound adjustment measures by borrowing countries; IMF support in helping those countries design their adjustment programs, in formulating comprehensive financing plans to accompany their adjustment efforts, and in providing a portion of the financing required; continued provision of financing by the commercial banking system where borrowers undertake and implement a sound IMF supported economic program; official willingness to provide emergency short-term liquidity support, where that is essential in the interim while IMF adjustment and financing programs are developed and put in place; and achievement of a broad-based, non-inflationary recovery in the industrial nations, which will provide expanding markets and a basis for the adjustments borrowers must make. The IMF is at the heart of this strategy. It simply must have adequate resources to fulfill its vital responsibility.

I believe the United States is on the verge of an impressive, non-inflationary and sustained recovery. Recovery in the United States is important to global recovery; but, by the same token, failure to deal effectively with problems facing the international economy could quickly undermine our own domestic economic efforts and prospects. Approval by the Congress of the proposed increases in our IMF quota and our participation in the General Arrangements to Borrow is a critically important component of our program to assure economic recovery and growing employment in the United States.

A report of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Policies, which provides background information on the proposed increases in the U.S. quota in the IMF and in U.S. participation in the General Arrangements to Borrow,[3] is being transmitted to the Congress separately. I strongly urge the Congress to consider the proposed increases promptly and favorably.

It will be appreciated if you will lay the enclosed draft bill before the House of Representatives (Senate). An identical proposal has been transmitted to the President of the Senate.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN

Document 63

Statement by the Secretary of the Treasury (Regan) Before a Task Force of the House Budget Committee, March 7, 1983 [4]

The Justification For an Increase in IMF Resources

Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure to appear before you today to explain and support the administration's proposals for legislation to increase the resources of the International Monetary Fund.

At the request of the task force, I will also discuss our proposals for the Multilateral Development Banks and the Eximbank. The written testimony I have submitted develops our proposals and their rationale in detail. [5]

In my remarks today I will begin with some of the key points relating to the central role the IMF must play in resolving the current international debt problem.

The international debt problems of Argentina, Brazil, Mexico, and a growing list of other borrowers, combined with a sharp cutback in bank lending to those countries last year, have subjected the international financial and economic system to strains that are without precedent in the postwar era—strains which threaten to derail world economic recovery.

Chart A [6] illustrates the rapid buildup of total debt by non-OPEC developing countries in recent years, and the expansion of commercial bank lending to LDC's. You can see here total debt and on the bottom in blue the total debt to banks.

[4] Source: International Monetary Fund Quota Increase: Hearing Before the Task Force on International Finance and Trade of the Committee on the Budget, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), pp. 1–6. Representative Mike Lowry was Chairman of the Task Force, which included six Democrats and four Republicans on the Budget Committee.

[5] Regan's prepared statement, containing numerous charts and appendices, is printed ibid., pp. 29–37.

[6] Charts A–I, to which Regan refers in his statement below, are printed ibid., pp. 29–37.

Chart B illustrates the sharp cutback in new commercial bank lending to LDC's last year.

You can see the rise from 1977 and culminating in 1981, but then the sharp drop from the $47 billion in 1981 back down to the $20 to $25 billion range in 1982. The problem is, one of the speed and degree of adjustment.

Borrowing countries must adjust their economies to slow the pace of external borrowing and maintain the capacity to service their debts—but there is a limit, in both economic and political terms, to the speed with which major adjustments can be made. Effective and orderly adjustment takes time, and attempts to push it too rapidly can be destabilizing.

There are a number of reasons why the United States should be concerned with the international debt problem. A cutoff of financing forces dramatic cuts in economic activity and imports by borrowing countries. A further abrupt and large-scale contraction of LDC imports could do major damage to the U.S. economy because about one-third of any cutback in imports by LDC's comes directly out of American exports and American export-related jobs. Such an abrupt reaction can be avoided with a smoother adjustment process, accompanied by some continued financing.

Foreign trade has become increasingly important to the U.S. economy. Chart C illustrates the very rapid expansion of U.S. exports during the 1970's. World export volume is here in green; U.S. export volume is in red.

Trade was the fastest growing part of the world economy in the last decade; and in the latter part of the decade U.S. export volume grew more than twice as fast as the volume of total world exports.

As a result of this growth, as shown in chart D, U.S. exports in 1980 accounted for 19 percent of total U.S. production of goods, compared to only 9 percent 10 years earlier. You can see the 9 percent in blue over here; the 19 percent here in red.

U.S. agricultural exports, shown in chart E, rose from $7.3 billion in 1970 to $42 billion in 1980; and our surplus in agricultural trade rose from $1.6 to $24.3 billion in 1980.

You can see the dramatic increase in U.S. agricultural exports and the fact we do have a net balance now of some $24 billion in 1980.

U.S. trade balance in services, illustrated in chart F, rose from $3 billion in 1970 to $34 billion in 1980 and an estimated $38 billion in 1982. You can see the dramatic change in this U.S. balance of trade in services and the impact it has had. By 1980 U.S. export-related jobs totaled some 5.1 million.

As shown on chart G, this represented an increase of over 75 percent in export-related jobs during the 1970's; and, as of 1980, each $1 billion of U.S. exports was estimated to result in 24,000 jobs.

You can see the dramatic increase in the decade from just under 3 million to over 5 million. As a result, an additional $1 billion of U.S. exports will produce 24,000 jobs.

Chart H shows that nearly 30 percent of U.S. exports go to non-OPEC LDC's, representing a market of roughly $64 billion for U.S. goods in 1980. That is very important to us, this dramatic rise in exports to the non-OPEC LDC's in the decade from the seventies to the eighties.

On the banking side, there are also impacts of concern to all Americans. If the situation were handled badly enough, LDC borrowers could be driven to consider measures which would result in widespread banking losses. This could lead to a major reduction in the banks' ability to lend to domestic customers, and significant upward pressure on U.S. interest rates.

Our strategy for dealing with this threat has five elements: First, and in the long run most important, must be effective adjustment in borrowing countries. The second essential element is the continued availability of temporary balance-of-payments financing from the IMF.

Third is bridge financing by governments and central banks in lending countries in exceptional cases of systemwide danger.

Fourth is continued commercial bank lending to countries that are pursuing sound adjustment programs.

The final part of our strategy is to restore sustainable economic growth, while avoiding protectionism which threatens both our own longrun growth prospects and the balance-of-payments adjustment efforts of the borrowing countries.

There are several reasons why the IMF has a central role in dealing with the current financial situation. IMF lending provides an extra margin of time and money which borrowers can use to bring their external positions back into reasonable balance in an orderly manner. The policy conditions attached to IMF lending are designed to assure that such adjustment does take place. In addition, a borrower's agreement with the IMF on an economic program is usually viewed as a "seal of approval" of the borrower's policies, and serves as a catalyst for additional private and official financing.

IMF conditionality has been controversial over the years, with some observers worrying that conditionality is so weak that IMF lending is really just another form of foreign aid, and others believing that conditionality is too tight.

The facts are that the IMF steers a middle course, requiring that adjustment measures be taken, but making it possible to adjust at an orderly rate. Most often IMF programs make possible a higher economic growth rate and a higher level of imports than would otherwise be the case—in the short run by providing financing which would not otherwise be available, and in the longer run by promoting sound economic policies and expanded export capacity. The current situation in Mexico is a good example.

Mexico is our third largest trading partner, after Canada and Japan. And, as recently as 1981, it was a partner with whom we had a substantial trade surplus. This changed dramatically in 1982, as Mexico began experiencing severe debt and liquidity problems. Our $4 billion trade surplus with Mexico in 1981 was transformed into a trade deficit of nearly $4 billion in 1982. This $8 billion deterioration, illustrated in Chart I, was our worst swing in trade performance with any country in the world, and it was due almost entirely to the financing problem.

You can see this, Mr. Chairman, here. Exports in black; imports in blue; and the trade balance, which had been favorable for so long, suddenly turning into a trade deficit with Mexico as a result of their financing problem.

We believe that now this situation will start to turn around, and we can begin to resume more normal exports to Mexico while its economy is put on a more sustainable path. If this happens, it will be due in large part to the fact that late in December an IMF program for Mexico went into effect.

Another important distinction between IMF financing and foreign aid is that all IMF members provide financing to the IMF under their quota subscriptions, and all, industrial and developing alike, have the right to draw on the IMF.

The United States has drawn on the IMF on 24 occasions, most recently in November 1978, and our cumulative drawings, amounting to the equivalent of $6.5 billion, are the second largest of any IMF member.

It now appears likely that the IMF's ability to commit resources to future adjustment programs will be exhausted by late 1983 or early 1984. If it is to continue playing its central role in resolving the debt problem, its resources will have to be expanded before then.

At the beginning of the current discussions of IMF resources in 1981, many IMF members favored a doubling or tripling of quotas. Ultimately the IMF membership agreed to our alternative proposals:

First, a much smaller quota increase, which would be adequate under normal circumstances. The agreed increase in IMF quotas is 47 percent, an increase from SDR 61 billion to SDR 90 billion; in current dollar terms, an increase from $67 billion to $99 billion. [7]

Second, establishment of a contingency borrowing arrangement that would be available to the IMF on a standby basis for use in situations threatening the stability of the system as a whole. The IMF's general arrangements to borrow would be modified for this purpose, and increased by about SDR 10.6 billion to a new total of SDR 17 billion. [8]

[7] The Interim Committee of the IMF Board of Governors announced the increase on February 11, 1983, following a 2-day meeting in Washington. For the text of the communique, see Global Economic Outlook: Hearings Before the Subcommittee on International Economic Policy and the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), pp. 442–445.

Overall, the proposed increase in U.S. commitments to the IMF totals the equivalent of $8.5 billion at current exchange rates. Of that total, about $5.8 billion would be for the quota increase and $2.7 billion for the GAB.

A topic of particular interest to this task force is how U.S. participation in the increase in IMF resources would affect the Federal budget and Treasury borrowing requirements. Because we receive a liquid monetary reserve asset in conjunction with our actual transfers of cash to the IMF, such transfers do not result in net budget outlays or an increase in the budget deficit.

However, actual cash transfers to and from the IMF do affect Treasury borrowing. This impact occurs as our quota in the IMF is drawn upon for lending, or as dollar repayments are received.

Thus the $5.8 billion we are proposing to add to our IMF quota would not raise Treasury borrowings by that full amount next year, but at most by smaller amounts over a number of years. Assuming that the full amount of the U.S. quota increase were committed to IMF programs in the first year, a very unlikely assumption, we would expect an average annual impact on Treasury borrowing requirements in the $1 to $1.5 billion range during 1984–87.

Historically, IMF operations have had an average annual impact on Treasury borrowing requirements of only about one-half billion dollars, although the pace has picked up in the last couple of years. Annex C [9] of my prepared statement presents data on the impact of IMF transactions on Treasury borrowing requirements since 1970.

The $2.7 billion increase in U.S. commitments to the GAB is for contingencies involving serious threats to the system. Our hope is that it will not need to be drawn on at all.

A major concern with the increase in IMF resources is that, in this period of budgetary stringency, many believe we would be better advised to spend the money at home.

There is also a feeling that if we can get the U.S. economy moving forward again the international debt problem will take care of itself.

We will do what is necessary domestically to strengthen our economy, but we will leave a major threat to domestic recovery unaddressed if we do not act to resolve the international financial situation. An improving U.S. economy is going to help other nations, both through our lower interest rates and through an expanding U.S. market for their exports. But they also have an immediate, shortrun financing crunch to get through, and if we don't handle that right there are substantial downside risks for our recovery.

There is also widespread concern that increased IMF resources would be used to bail out banks from a problem that is the result of their own lending decisions and do that at the expense of the taxpayer.

I would answer that the steps being taken to deal with the debt problem, including the increase in IMF resources, require continued bank involvement.

Far from allowing them to cut and run, orderly adjustment requires that banks increase lending to troubled borrowers that are prepared to adopt serious economic programs. They have just done that in the case of Brazil and Mexico.

Another point I would like to make is that the whole debt problem cannot fairly be said to be the fault of the commercial banks. Certainly, part of it relates to decisions by banks, and we are looking at ways of improving banking and regulatory practices to avoid a recurrence. But Government policies created the economic environment in which those loans looked good, and the environment in which they have since turned sour.

I would next like to summarize our proposals for U.S. participation in the IMF

[8] The increase in the IMF's General Arrangements to Borrow, announced by the finance ministers and central bank governors of the Group of Ten following their meeting on January 18, 1983, consisted of a rise from SDR 6.4 billion to SDR 17 billion, or from $7.1 billion to $19 billion in current dollars. For text of the press communiqué, see ibid., pp. 446–448.

[9] Appendix C, "Budgetary and Financing Impact of Transactions with the IMF under the U.S. Quota in the IMF and U.S. Loans to the IMF", is printed in International Monetary Fund Quota Increase, pp. 64–69.

lateral development banks, the World Bank group, and the regional development banks. The objectives of MDB programs are markedly different from those of the IMF. They lend primarily to finance portions of specific investment projects over a longer term, and only to developing countries.

Because the MDB's are an important part of our total foreign assistance, we have been making a major effort to further improve their effectiveness. Such improvements include greater selectivity and conditionality in their lending, emphasis on catalyzing flows of private capital to complement their own lending, and graduation and maturation to target concessional lending on the countries with greatest needs.

For U.S. participation in the MDB's during fiscal year 1984, the administration is requesting $1.6 billion in budget authority. Of this amount, $193 million is for subscriptions to paid-in capital and the remainder is for contributions to the concessional windows of the MDB's. The actual budget outlays resulting from these would be spread over many years, as the banks made loans drawing on U.S. subscriptions and contributions.

In addition, we are requesting $2.9 billion in program limitations for subscriptions to the callable capital of the MDB's. The banks use callable capital as backing for borrowing on international capital markets. The capital itself could only be spent to meet MDB obligations for their borrowings and guarantees in the unlikely event that their other resources were insufficient to meet those liabilities.

We are also requesting budget authority for the Export-Import Bank of the United States of $3.8 billion in direct credits and $10 billion in guarantees and insurance in fiscal year 1984. The increased support for U.S. exports through guarantees and insurance is designed to encourage the continued availability of credit to finance U.S. exports at a time when debt problems have been making commercial lenders more cautious. The level of direct credit authority we are requiring reflects a general lowering of market interest rates which is making subsidized foreign financing less of a problem, as well as an effort to increase the use of long-term guarantees.

In addition, we will seek supplemental direct credit authority of up to $2.7 billion if foreign subsidized financing again emerges as a serious problem.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, the IMF plays a crucial role in the solution to current debt and liquidity problems, and in providing the environment for world recovery. It is absolutely essential that the proposed increase in IMF resources become effective by the end of this year to enable the IMF to meet these responsibilities.

Prompt U.S. approval is important not only because the financing is needed, but also because it would be a sign of confidence to other governments and to the public, and would help lay to rest concerns about the risks to global recovery.

But, most important, timely approval of these proposals is essential to our own economic interests, to the prospects for American business and American jobs. The legislation to give effect to these proposals was transmitted to the Congress last week. I urge that you give it prompt and favorable consideration.

The Importance of Timely Congressional Action

In meetings here today, I have once again asked for congressional approval of the American share of an increase in lending resources for the International Monetary Fund (IMF). The Senate has already approved the request [11] and the House will take up the measure next week.

Continued

The IMF has been a cornerstone of U.S. foreign economic policy under Republican and Democratic administrations for nearly 40 years, and it remains a cornerstone of the foreign economic policy of this administration.

In the past decade the economy has witnessed soaring inflation and interest rates, plunging commodity prices, and worldwide recession. While the international economic outlook is now improving, the experience of past years has contributed to a major international debt problem that poses grave risks for the U.S. and world economies. We have formulated a strategy for dealing with this problem, and the IMF plays a key role in it. IMF resources, however, are running low and unless action is taken to increase them, the IMF may no longer be able to play that role.

Some argue that increasing IMF resources is simply a way to bail-out big bankers who made imprudent loans. This is wrong. In fact, IMF involvement has brought more, not less participation by private banks. It is important to remember that the IMF makes no gifts, that it lends money to governments, and that it charges interest on its loans and assures that proper economic policies are in place to correct the problems and to assure that the loans are repaid.

All of this is very important to the American economy. In 1980, U.S. exports accounted for 19 percent of total production of goods and, during the decade of the seventies, export-related jobs rose 75 percent to over 5 million. The ability of the IMF to deal with the current strains in the international financial system will have a powerful impact on American exports and on American jobs. If the IMF is not in a position to help countries help themselves, our economic recovery could be aborted and unemployment start rising again.

Therefore, I urge the House of Representatives to act favorably on this legislation. No legislation now before the Congress is more important to a healthy world economy and to a continuing economic recovery here in the United States.

Address by the Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Wallis) Before the International Summer School of the American Bankers Association, August 25, 1983 [12]

Bankers and the International Debt

Bankers have never been popular. They are victims of irrational attitudes, fed in part by popular melodramas in which hard-hearted bankers drive kindly widows and lovable children from hearth and home. This attitude toward bankers and banking inevitably influences public policy. We see it today, for example, as opponents of the IMF quota legislation—both on the right and on the left—call the bill a "bail out" for big banks. "They made their bed, let them lie in it" is the argument.

Let's take a look tonight at the origins of today's "debt problem," paying particular attention to the role of private banks and other private financial institutions functioning in international capital markets. Then let's think about the way private institutions can play a constructive role in resolving the current situation, which is so often described as a "crisis."

Although the economic problems we are now experiencing seem to have arisen suddenly, they clearly had their roots in the economic environment and policies of the last two decades. Inflationary pressures began mounting during the late 1960s and were aggravated by (indeed, may have contributed to) the commodity boom of the early 1970s, including the first oil shock. In most industrialized countries, policies adopted after the first oil shock led to a surge of inflation; to large transfers of real income and wealth to oil exporters; and to a deterioration of the current account balances of oil importers. For the oil-importing LDCs, this process was compounded by the decline in export earnings when the commodity boom burst.

[12] Source: Current Policy No. 505, August 25, 1983, Bureau of Public Affairs, Department of State. Wallis made the address in Washington, D.C.

For oil-importing countries, industrialized and developing alike, the appropriate policies would have been fiscal and monetary restraint to prevent transmission of the increases in the price of oil into increases in the general level of prices and adjustment of consumption to the lower real income that resulted from the higher price of oil. Instead, most oil-importing nations—developed and developing, including the United States—attempted to avoid the painful adjustments that were unavoidable by adopting inflationary domestic policies and by borrowing abroad to cover the swollen deficits in their current accounts.

Economic policies, our own included, did not face up to the need to adjust. Instead, their primary concern was efficient "recycling" of the OPEC surpluses—a euphemism for the idea that all countries would be able to borrow as much as they needed. The incentive to borrow rather than to adjust was strong. Interest rates were low in relation to current and expected inflation; liquidity was abundant; and both borrowers and lenders expected that continued inflation would lead to ever-increasing export revenues and reduce the real burden of foreign debts. These conditions persisted well into the second oil shock of 1978–79.

By the end of 1982, the total foreign debt of non-OPEC developing countries was over $600 billion—more than four times as large as it had been 10 years earlier. Most of the increases in foreign debt reflected borrowing from commercial banks in industrial countries. Lending by these banks to non-OPEC LDCs, for example, grew from $130 billion at the end of 1978, by $37 billion in 1979, by $43 billion in 1980, by $47 billion in 1981, and by $31 billion in 1982. By the end of 1982, the LDCs owed roughly $300 billion to commercial banks in the industrial countries. Since the early 1970s, commercial banks have provided over 60% of total LDC financing, up from 40% in the early 1970s. Thus, it is clear that any lasting solution to the debt problem must center around the commercial banks.

Expansionary policies and excessively easy monetary conditions were able to delay the need to adjust but not to eliminate it. For the past 2 years, we have been witnessing a collision between today's policies of restraint and the inflationary binge of the 1970s. The immediate result of this disinflation—necessary and desirable though it was—has been stagnating demand, depressed trade, and declining commodity prices. Interest rates are high by historical standards, in large part because expectations—based on experience—are that governments and central banks will not stay the course to eliminate inflation.

Disinflation has hit the LDCs hard. Aggregate real output of the LDCs this year is expected to grow by only 1%–1.5%, the least growth since 1980. African countries have been especially hard hit because of their dependence on exports of primary commodities and their inability to attract foreign private capital.

Austerity in developing countries can, if excessive, cause political turbulence that jeopardizes U.S. interests in various ways. In neighboring countries, economic difficulties stimulate illegal immigration into the United States. Economic troubles were probably a factor in recent political upheavals in such countries as Liberia, Ghana, and the Central African Republic. Earlier this year, rioting in Brazil was laid to debt-related austerity measures. The expulsion of immigrant workers from Nigeria was based on similar causes.

I do not want to overemphasize the political aspect of the debt crisis. LDCs must adjust to the new economic reality. But adjustment must take place within the limits of what is politically possible, with sufficient financial support to achieve stability and to permit these countries to prepare to take advantage of the economic recovery that is now starting.

The debt and liquidity problems did not develop overnight and neither will solutions. We in the Reagan Administration are, however, working on a broad-based strategy involving all the key participants—governments of the developing and industrialized countries, commercial banks, and the IMF. This strategy has five main parts.

First, and foremost, we must continue to work to restore sustainable noninflationary growth in the United States and to preserve and strengthen the free trading system. The elements for a recovery are in place. Interest and inflation rates are down and inventory rundowns are largely complete. There is strong evidence that recovery is underway in the United States, and there are signs of recovery in Britain, Germany, and Japan. We must, however, exercise caution at this juncture. Excessive monetary or fiscal expansion would rekindle inflation. Yielding to protectionist pressures could abort the recovery.

The second part of our strategy is to get borrowing countries to adjust their economic policies. They must get their economies back on a stable course and make sure that their development programs are within their means. The adjustments cannot be completed overnight; in many cases it will take years. But impediments to recovery such as rigid exchange rates, subsidies, protectionist measures, uncontrolled government spending, and excessive creation of money are obvious places to start adjusting. The need for corrective policies has been recognized and is being acted on by many borrowers—in many cases with support from the IMF.

The third element of our strategy is that official balance-of-payments financing must be available to help see borrowers through the adjustment process. The IMF is the key to this. The IMF not only provides temporary balance-of-payments assistance but also ensures that use of its funds is linked to necessary changes of policy by borrowers. No other institution has the expertness or the prestige to enforce such measures. It is thus extremely important that the IMF has sufficient resources to carry out its mission. For that reason, the Administration is urging Congress to approve the proposed expansion of IMF quotas quickly.

The fourth element of our strategy is that governments and central banks in lending countries must be prepared to act quickly when debt emergencies occur. Recent experience has shown that often it is necessary to consider immediate and substantial short-term financing to tide countries over their negotiations with the IMF and discussions with other creditors. It must be emphasized that lending of this sort is very short-term and can only facilitate, not supplant, other arrangements.

The fifth element of our strategy is to encourage continuation of lending by commercial banks to countries that are pursuing sound adjustment programs. In the last few months of 1982, some banks, both in the United States and abroad, sought to limit or reduce outstanding loans to troubled borrowers. But an orderly resolution of this present situation requires not only a willingness by banks to rollover existing debts but in some cases even to increase their net lending to developing countries, including the most troubled borrowers.

While I have described these five points as the Reagan administration's policy—and they are—I should emphasize that the United States is not alone in dealing with the problem. The closeness and effectiveness of international cooperation, and of cooperation between governments and private financial institutions, have been noteworthy, even heart warming.

These five points form a comprehensive approach to the debt problems facing us today. The fifth element, continued commercial bank lending, is, however, impossible for a government such as ours to control. We cannot, nor do we want to, direct or assume responsibility for the lending decisions of private financial institutions.

Commercial banks are profit-making institutions and are responsible to their shareholders to make the best possible return. They are not foreign policy agencies, nor are they intended to provide development assistance. They are intermediaries between sources and users of funds. They must have confidence that their depositors are protected by reasonable prospects that loans will be repaid.

In domestic banking, the use of collateral contributes to an effective financial system. There is also an organized procedure for debtors to get out from under a burden of debt that is unsupportable. Bankruptcy is not without costs to creditor and debtor, but it is a proven, functioning mechanism in domestic business.

In the international arena, however, neither collateral nor bankruptcy procedures are available. Collateral is virtually meaningless in sovereign lending. Bankruptcy and default are not established means of reorganizing government debts. In addition, for reasons of foreign policy, governments in the banks' home countries get involved when payments on loans are in jeopardy. In fact, the question is now being asked: "How can governments get the banks to continue lending to the LDCs?"

The answer obviously is that if banks have reasonable assurance that continued lending will be profitable, they will continue to lend. That is at the heart of the way a market system works. Prospects for profit depend on medium- and long-run factors, not just short-run; just as in domestic lending, it is not profitable to precipitate a crisis when the borrower has reasonable prospects of restoring its capacity to pay.

Rumors of "debtors' cartels," debt repudiation, unilateral payments moratoria, and other threats in that vein from debtors undermine confidence by introducing doubts about the will rather than the capacity of borrowers to repay. In international banking, even more than in domestic banking, confidence is essential.

The proper question, therefore, is how can reasonable assurance of repayment be maintained or restored so that private banks will continue to participate fully in international lending? The IMF clearly has a major role here. So do the borrowing countries, which must recognize that the banks will respond, first and foremost, to economic and financial incentives. The developed countries also have a responsibility. Debts cannot be paid unless export revenues can be earned. Manufacturing exports from developing countries face the stiffest of trade barriers. Commodity exports are particularly vulnerable to recession in the developed countries.

The next logical step in this line of reasoning, therefore, is to explore the relations between international finance and international trade. After all, international finance is simply the medium of exchange which facilitates trade. The greatest danger to the national welfare that would result from a collapse of the financial system would not be the losses suffered by banks and their stockholders. The greatest damage would be the collapse of the trading system that has been the driving force of postwar economic progress. If, however, I were to elaborate on the relation of finance to trade, I surely would go on for a full 50 minutes or more.

Instead, I will conclude by returning to the popular melodrama. It is not useful to look for a villain in the piece. What is useful is for all of the participants to examine their own roles. The important question that each participant must ask is whether he is contributing to the solution or to the problem. While governments, including ours, had much to do with creating the problem, I am satisfied that now our government is making major contributions to its solution. I hope that each of you can give sincerely a similar answer. I believe you can.

Statement by President Reagan, September 9, 1983 (Extract) [13]

U.S. International Investment Policy

I am releasing a major statement on international investment. This statement was developed by my Senior Interdepartmental Group on International Economic Policy chaired by Treasury Secretary Regan, and encompasses the views of this administration on international investment.

The last time such a policy paper was released was in July of 1977—more than 6 years ago. Since then, we have come to view international investment which responds to market forces as a vital and necessary ingredient in a stable, growing world economy.

A world with strong foreign investment flows is the opposite of a zero-sum game. We believe there are only winners, no losers, and all participants gain from it.

International investment flows significantly affect the United States and world economies. With the current environment of widespread international debt problems, foreign direct investment flows take on increased importance. As the preeminent home and host country for foreign direct investment, we have a substantial interest in the conditions under which those flows occur.

The statement I am releasing enunciates the fundamental premise of our policy—that foreign investment flows which respond to private market forces will lead to more efficient international production and thereby benefit both home and host countries.

It also highlights three other important points. First, our concern with the increasing use of governmental measures to distort or impede international investment flows. Secondly, our strong support for the concept of national treatment which extends to foreign direct investors in the United States. And finally, an enumeration of specific multilateral and bilateral steps the administration has taken, and will take, to help liberalize international investment flows.

A free and open international investment climate will play a key role, not only in sustaining our own economic recovery here at home, but also in resolving many of the current international debt problems.

INTERNATIONAL INVESTMENT POLICY STATEMENT

Executive Summary

International direct investment plays a vital and expanding role in the world economy. To ensure its maximum contribution to both global and domestic economic well-being, the United States believes that international direct investment flows should be determined by private market forces and should receive non-discriminatory treatment consistent with the national treatment principle.

The United States welcomes foreign direct investment that flows according to market forces. The United States accords foreign investors the same fair, equitable, and non-discriminatory treatment it believes all governments should accord foreign direct investment under international law.

The United States opposes continued and increasing government intervention that impedes or distorts investment flows or attempts to shift artificially the benefits of these flows. These measures include trade-related or other performance requirements, fiscal or financial incentives, and discriminatory treatment of foreign investment.

To counter such measures, the United States will pursue an active international investment policy aimed at reducing foreign government actions that impede or distort investment flows, and at developing an international system, based on national treatment and most-favored-nation principles, that permits investment flows to respond more freely to market forces. The United States will work to protect U.S. investment abroad from treatment which is discriminatory or otherwise inconsistent with international law standards. Under international law, no U.S. investment should be expropriated unless the taking is done for a public purpose, is accomplished under due process of law, is non-discriminatory, does not violate previous contractual arrangements, and is accompanied by prompt, adequate, and effective compensation.

In carrying out its international investment policy, in multilateral institutions, the United States will continue to:

—encourage OECD member governments to adhere to, strengthen and extend OECD investment and capital liberalization instruments;

—explore ways of extending the principles embodied in the OECD instruments to non-OECD countries;

—support efforts to increase awareness of the extent and adverse effects of government intervention in order to build a global political consensus to reduce such intervention;

—work toward increased recognition of intellectual property rights;

—work in the OECD to examine investment problems that affect the service industries, recognizing that for these sectors the opportunity to do business in foreign countries is dependent, in many respects, on the ability to establish foreign operations that are governed by discriminatory investment rules;

—work in the OECD for a "data pledge" which would assure that no new barriers to data flows will be imposed by developed countries; and encourage all countries to join in adopting more open and liberal policies on transborder flows;

—work to ensure that any technology transfers which occur are carried out on a sound commercial basis subject to national security and foreign policy considerations;

—encourage the Multilateral Banks to explore ways to strengthen the private sector role in facilitating financial flows to the developing world;

—support investor access to third-party arbitration to settle investment disputes.

In its relations with individual countries, the United States will:

—provide services and assistance to American investors abroad, and offer the full support necessary to ensure that their investments are treated in accordance with standards of international law;

—seek to ensure that the provisions of U.S. Friendship, Commerce and Navigation treaties and bilateral investment treaties and agreements are fully observed;

—seek to conclude bilateral investment treaties and agreements with interested countries;

—explore other appropriate ways to support private direct investment in developing countries;

—reserve the right to take action against the use of performance requirements and similar policies, consistent with international obligations. The United States will also exercise its rights under existing international agreements.

The United States believes that a combination of multilateral and bilateral efforts will contribute to a more open global climate for investment and thus enhance the prospects for economic growth in the United States and globally.

Address by President Reagan Before the 38th Annual Meeting of the Boards of Governors of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank Group, September 27, 1983 [14]

A Mission To Improve the Human Condition

Good morning, Mr. de Larosière, Governors of the World Bank, and its affiliates, and of the International Monetary Fund, distinguished colleagues and guests. On behalf of my fellow Americans, I'm delighted to welcome you to the United States and to our Nation's capital. And I am honored to have this opportunity to speak again to your distinguished members.

I say honored because I believe that your institutions, the World Bank and affiliates, and the International Monetary Fund, serve noble purposes. There can be no higher mission than to improve the human condition and to offer opportunities for fulfillment in our individual lives and the life of our national and world communities.

You are the leaders of the world community in bringing a better life to the diverse and often tragically poor people of our planet. You have worked tirelessly to preserve the framework for international economic cooperation and to generate confidence and competition in the world economy.

The unending quest for economic, social, and human improvement is the basic drive that inspires and unites all of us. In 1945, when your great institutions were established, the civilized world had been brought to its knees by a wave of totalitarian violence that inflicted suffering, sacrifice, and the suppression of human rights on millions of innocent people.

Security, freedom, and prosperity were very much on the minds of the citizens of the world in 1945. They should be on our minds today. The institutions you represent could not have been born, could not have flourished—and may I add will not survive—in a world dominated by a system of cruelty that disregards individual rights and the value of human life in its ruthless drive for power. No state can be regarded as preeminent over the rights of individuals. Individual rights are supreme.

In this civilization we have labored so faithfully to resurrect, preserve, and enhance, let us be ever mindful: It is not just development and prosperity, but ultimately our peace and our freedom that are always at stake. Too often the demands of prosperity and security are viewed as competitors when, in fact, they are complementary, natural and necessary allies. We cannot prosper unless we are secure, and we cannot be secure unless we are free.

The goals of the great international, political, and economic institutions—the United Nations where I spoke yesterday, and the World Bank, its affiliates, and the IMF you represent here today—were to be reached by trusting in a shared and enduring truth: The keys to personal fulfillment, national development, human progress and world peace are freedom and responsibility for individuals and cooperation among nations. When I addressed the delegates of the United Nations yesterday, [15] I reminded them: You have the right to dream great dreams, to seek a better world for your people. And all of us have the responsibility to work for that better world. As caring, peaceful peoples, think what a powerful force for good we could be.

Today I come before your distinguished assembly in that same spirit—a messenger for prosperity and security through the principles of freedom, responsibility, and cooperation.

When our nations trusted in these great principles in the postwar years, the civilized world enjoyed unparalleled economic development and improvement in the human condition. We witnessed a virtual explosion of world output and trade, and the arrival of many free, self-determined, independent nation states as new members of the international system.

And, as I said when I last spoke to you, the societies that achieved the most spectacular, broad-based economic progress in the shortest period of time have not been the biggest in size, nor the richest in resources and certainly not the most rigidly controlled. What has united them all was their belief in the magic of the marketplace. Millions of individuals making their own decision in the marketplace will always allocate resources better than any centralized government planning process.

Trust the people, this is the crucial lesson of history. Because only when the human spirit is allowed to worship, invent, create and produce, only when individuals are given a personal stake in deciding their destiny and benefiting from their own risks, only then do societies become dynamic, prosperous, progressive and free.

In the turbulent decade of the 1970s, too many of us, the United States included, forgot the principles that produced the basis for our mutual economic progress. We permitted our governments to overspend, overtax and overregulate us toward soaring inflation and record interest rates. Now we see more clearly again. We are working and cooperating to bring our individual economies and the world economy back to more solid foundations of low inflation, personal incentives for saving and investment, higher productivity, and greater opportunities for our people.

Our first task was to get our own financial and economic house in order. Our countries are interdependent, but without a foundation of sound domestic policies, the international economic system cannot expand and improve. Merely providing additional official development assistance will not produce progress. This is true for all countries, developed and developing, without exception. As the 1983 development report of the World Bank [16] notes, "International actions will greatly improve the external environment confronting developing countries, but cannot supplant the efforts that the developing countries must make themselves."

I believe the United States is making real progress. Since we took office, we've reduced the rate of growth in our Federal Government's spending by nearly 40 percent. We have cut the inflation rate dramatically, from 12.4 percent, to 2.6 percent for the last 12 months. The prime interest rate has been cut nearly in half, from 21-1/2 percent to 11 percent. Figures released last week reveal our Gross National Product grew at an annual rate of almost 10 percent in the second quarter and about 7 percent is estimated for the third.

In the United States, we still face a large projected deficit which concerns us because deficit Federal spending and borrowing drain capital, capital that would otherwise be invested for stronger economic growth. But as Secretary Regan correctly pointed out in the Interim Committee Sunday, the deficit is coming down as a result of economic growth. Revenues are higher than anticipated and we expect continued improvement. We'll continue to work for greater restraint in Federal spending but we will not risk sabotaging our economic expansion in a shortsighted attempt to reduce deficits by raising taxes. What tax increases would actually reduce is economic growth—by discouraging savings, investment and consumption.

[16] International Bank for Reconstruction and Development/World Bank, World Development Report 1983 (Washington, 1983).

One other point about the U.S. deficit: Let me make clear that it is caused in part by our determination to provide the military strength and political security to ensure peace in the world. Our commitment to military security is matched by our resolve to negotiate a verifiable nuclear arms reduction treaty. Only then can we safely reduce military expenditures and their drain on our resources. As I mentioned at the outset, there can be no lasting prosperity without security and freedom.

Turning more directly to economic development, all signs point to a world economic recovery gaining momentum. As early as last February, the Conference Board predicted that economic growth rates in the United States from six major industrial countries spell economic recovery in any language. Since then, industrial production in the OECD countries has been moving up. Your own IMF economists are predicting growth in the world economy of at least 3 percent next year. This is the brightest outlook in several years.

As the U.S. economy picks up steam, our imports rise with it. When you consider that half of all non-OPEC developing country manufactured goods exported to the industrialized countries come to the United States, it's clear what a strong stimulus our imports provide for economic expansion abroad. And as other economies prosper, our exports in turn increase. We all gain.

Many nations are moving steadily forward toward self-sustaining growth. And like us, they are doing it by relying again on the marketplace. This period of adjustment has not been easy for us. In fact, it's been very painful. But it is the one way that does work, and it's beginning to pay dividends.

Economic recovery is spreading its wings and taking flight. We all know those wings have not spread far enough. And I would add, recovery alone is not good enough. Our challenge is far greater: Lasting, worldwide economic expansion. Together, we must make the 1980s an historic era of transition toward sustained, noninflationary world growth. I have every confidence that we can, and with our combined leadership and cooperation, we will.

The IMF is the linchpin of the international financial system. Among official institutions, it serves as a counselor, coaxing the world economy toward renewed growth and stability. At various times in its history, the IMF has provided important temporary balance of payments assistance to its member nations, including my own. At times, it must play the "Dutch uncle," talking frankly, telling those of us in government things we need to hear, but would rather not. We know how significant the IMF's role has been in assisting troubled debtor countries, many of which are making courageous strides to regain financial health.

We warmly applaud the efforts of Mr. de Larosière and his staff.

My administration is committed to what is legitimately needed to help ensure that the IMF continues as the cornerstone of the international financial system. Let me make something very plain: I have an unbreakable commitment to increased funding for the IMF. But the U.S. Congress so far has failed to act to pass the enabling legislation.[17] I urge the Congress to be mindful of its responsibility and to meet the pledge of our government.

The IMF quota legislation has been pending for several months, and I do not appreciate the partisan wrangling and political posturing that have been associated with this issue during recent weeks. I urge members of both political parties to lay aside their differences, to abandon harsh rhetoric and unreasonable demands, and to get on with the task in a spirit of true bipartisanship. The stakes are great. This legislation is not only crucial to the recovery of America's trading partners abroad and to the stability of the entire international financial system, it is also necessary to a sustained recovery in the United States.

[17] The House of Representatives approved the administration's request for an IMF and GAB quota increase on November 18, 1983, with the passage of HR 3959, entitled the "Domestic Housing and International Recovery and Financial Stability Act". President Reagan signed the bill on November 30. For text of the IMF funding provision contained in Title XI of the Act, see 97 Stat. 1287.

The sum we are requesting will not increase our budget deficit and it will be returned with interest as loans are repaid to the IMF. What's more, it will keep the wheels of world commerce turning and create jobs. Exports account for one out of eight manufacturing jobs in our country, the United States. Forty percent of our agricultural products are exported. I am afraid that even today too few in the Congress realize the United States is interdependent with both the developed and the developing world.

Examine the record: The United States has been a dependable partner, reaching out to help developing countries who are laboring under excessive debt burdens. These major debtor countries have already undertaken difficult measures in a concerted effort to get their economic houses in order. Most of them are working closely with the IMF to overcome economic hardships. They continue to demonstrate a commendable willingness to make necessary adjustments. And that's why I can state that our participation in the IMF quota increase is not a government bailout of these debtor countries or of the banks which are sharing the burden. On the contrary, IMF plans to assist financially troubled countries call for the banks to put up more new money than the IMF itself.

This is by nature a cooperative enterprise. If the Congress does not approve our participation, the inevitable consequence would be a withdrawal by other industrialized countries from doing their share. At the end of this road could be a major disruption of the entire world trading and financial systems—an economic nightmare that could plague generations to come. No one can afford to make light of the responsibility we all share.

We strongly support the World Bank. In fact, the United States remains its largest single contributor. We recognize its key role in stimulating world development and the vital assistance it provides to developing nations. Here again, I have proposed legislation to meet our commitment for funding the World Bank and especially the International Development Association. It is important that these funds be available to help the people in the poorest countries raise their standards of living. Tomorrow, Secretary Regan will be discussing both the Fund and the Bank in more detail. Because our investment in the World Bank's operations is so large, we feel a special responsibility to provide constructive suggestions to make it even more effective.

Let me simply underscore again a fundamental point. And I say this as the spokesman for a compassionate, caring people. The heart of America is good and her heart is true. We've provided more concessional assistance to developing nations than any other country—more than $130 billion in the last three decades. Whether the question at hand be bank project financing or fund balance of payments assistance, it must be considered a complement to, not a substitute for, sound policies at home. If policies are sound, financing can be beneficial. If policies are irresponsible, all the aid in the world will be no more than money down the drain.

As we work together for recovery, we must be on guard against storm clouds of protectionist pressures building on the horizon. At the recent Economic Summit in Williamsburg, my fellow leaders and I renewed our commitment to an open and expanding world trading system. The Williamsburg Declaration reads, "We commit ourselves to halt protectionism, and as recovery proceeds, to reverse it by dismantling trade barriers."[18]

Whether such words will prove to be empty promises, or symbols of a powerful commitment, depends on the real day-to-day actions which each of our governments take. Everyone is against protectionism in the abstract. That is easy. It is another matter to make the hard, courageous choices when it is your industry or your business that appears to be hurt by foreign competition. I know, we in the United States deal with the problem of protectionism every day of the year.

We are far from perfect, but the United States offers the most free and open economy in the world. We import far more goods than any nation on earth. There is more foreign investment here than any where else. And access to our commercial and capital markets is relatively free.

Protectionism is not a problem solver; it is a problem creator. Protectionism invites retaliation. It means you will buy less from your trading partners, they will buy less from you, the world economic pie will shrink and the danger of political turmoil will increase.

You know, I've made this analogy before. But we and our trading partners are in the same boat. If one partner shoots a hole in the bottom of the boat, does it make sense for the other partner to shoot another hole in the boat? Some people say yes and call it getting tough. I call it getting wet—all over.

We must plug the holes in the boat of open markets and free trade and set sail again in the direction of prosperity.

No one should mistake our determination to use our full power and influence to prevent anyone from destroying the boat and sinking us all.

I firmly believe that we can and must go forward together, hand in hand, not looking for easy villains to explain our problems, but resolved to pursue the proven path on which these institutions embarked almost four decades ago—a path of economic progress and political independence for all countries and for all people.

In closing, let me share with you a very deep personal belief I hold. We are all sovereign nations and therefore free to choose our own way as long as we do not transgress upon the sovereign rights of one another. But we cannot really be free as independent states unless we respect the freedom and independence of each of our own individual citizens. In improving their lot, which is the only reason you and I hold high offices in our lands, we cannot forget that how we help them progress economically must be consistent with this highest objective of all—their personal dignity, their independence, and ultimately their freedom. That's what this job of ours is all about.

Thank you very much, and God bless you all. (Applause)

Statement by the Secretary of Energy (Hodel) Before a Subcommittee of the House Government Operations Committee, March 17, 1983 [1]

International Oil Markets and U.S. Energy Policy

I appreciate the opportunity to be here today, Mr. Chairman, and discuss with you and the members of your committee some of the issues that have been raised.

In the invitation, the question had to do with OPEC pricing, and that is what my opening statement [2] deals with. It does not deal with some of the other issues which have been raised in your opening statement. [3]

But I would certainly agree, we are at a time when a careful and thoughtful review of all our energy policies is in order, because we are at a time of a market change. And clearly, something must be done to analyze what those impacts will be.

I would be misleading you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, if I thought that I could come up here today and resolve all those issues and answer all those questions in a definitive way, but I would certainly look forward to the discussion that I hope will ensue.

I have tried to be, as Congressman Wise indicated, open and accessible to Members of Congress who are concerned about energy issues, and I only wish I were as knowledgeable or felt as knowledgeable as Congressman Craig indicated he thought I was. I will probably get an opportunity to display the level of knowledge that I don't feel I have today in the course of this hearing.

I would like to introduce the Deputy Assistant Secretary for International Affairs of the Department of Energy, Mr. George Bradley, who is also, I think, very knowledgeable with regard to the international activities of the Department, and particularly with regard to international oil activities, since that is an area that we pay particular attention to.

I certainly agree with the committee that these hearings come at an interesting juncture because of the oil market situation as OPEC has just cut the nominal price for its oil for the first time in its history.

The decline in oil prices resulted from the continued softness in world oil markets, which is primarily due to decline in free world consumption of approximately 7 million barrels per day or 13 percent from its peak of 52.4 million barrels a day in 1979 to a level of 45.5 million barrels a day last year.

Second, there has been an increase in the non-OPEC oil production of about 2.5 million barrels a day, which is a 12-percent increase—actually greater than a 12-percent increase during that period.

A number of the other factors have contributed additional downward pressure on price—and certainly during this last winter—including oil demand that's been further depressed by unseasonably warm weather, additional efficiency gains that have been made in energy, and particularly oil use; worldwide economic performance has been sluggish; inventories have been liquidated by those holding them at higher-than-normal rates; the market has lost confidence in OPEC's ability to restore stability; and most non-OPEC producers and several OPEC producers have either unilaterally, officially or unofficially, cut the price of oil.

These deteriorating conditions in the world oil market have caused OPEC, and even some non-OPEC, production levels to fall dramatically.

OPEC's current production is estimated to be at about the 14-million-barrels-a-day level, which is 5 million barrels a day less than last year's depressed level of production for OPEC of 18.8 million barrels a day.

While some rebound in OPEC's production is likely as the year progresses, OPEC's share of free world oil supplies, in our view, will fall to between 40 and 45 percent from its peak of 62 percent in 1979.

Saudi Arabia has borne the bulk of this decline having had its production decline from nearly 10 million barrels a day in 1981 to 3.7 million barrels a day in the month of February—this year, a rather marked decline.

The market situation has led to renewed OPEC price and production negotiations and then the subsequent agreement which was announced on March 14, 1982.

My understanding is, this agreement provides for: A reduction in the price of Saudi light, the OPEC market crude, by $5, from $34 to $29 per barrel; continuation of the existing quality price differentials, with the exception of Nigeria, where a special provision allows it to price its crude 50 cents below competitive crudes; establishment of an overall OPEC ceiling of 17.5 million barrels a day which is 500,000 barrels per day above the current level of production, with an allocation of individual production quotas for all countries except Saudi Arabia, which becomes the swing producer under that agreement. And member countries agree to avoid giving discounts.

The impact of the recent OPEC agreement on future oil market developments is too uncertain to predict, with confidence, obviously. Spot prices continue to run well below the new official sales prices. We saw indications that some major suppliers in the international market had already determined to go below that price. OPEC production levels are significantly lower than the agreed 17.5-million-barrels-a-day quota, and current consumption and inventory trends certainly are subject to change.

A climate of uncertainty exists that is fueling speculation that the prices could decline even further. There is a possibility that present market conditions will continue with little improvement thus forcing another reduction in OPEC prices, but not necessarily in a formal way. It may be that producers in OPEC will seek through discounts or other arrangements to find the bottom of the market without having to change the formal published price to a lower level.

The final outcome of the price slide, obviously, is uncertain. Even a relatively precipitous price decline would be generally beneficial. Our preliminary thinking has concluded that even a further drop in oil prices would certainly be manageable. It would lead to higher economic growth in employment and lower inflation which would more than offset adverse effects on oil industry profits and incentives or exploration, conservation, and alternative energy development. On balance we think it would have a beneficial effect on world economic recovery as well, Mr. Chairman.

The current world oil situation is extremely favorable from an energy supply perspective. Rapid increases in oil prices in the wake of the Iranian revolution have produced drastic declines in oil consumption and major gains in non-OPEC oil supplies. This trend has been particularly pronounced for the United States.

U.S. oil consumption has fallen 3.2 million barrels per day or about 17 percent between 1977 and 1982. This reduction is greater than the consumption of any other individual country, with the exception of Japan and the Soviet Union.

Last year, OPEC supplied 14 percent of our oil consumption and 42 percent of our oil imports, compared to 34 percent and 70 percent respectively in 1977; a marked change, one which I commented on in an earlier hearing and was misunderstood to be suggesting that they were no longer significant, which was certainly not what I intended to imply but rather that the extent of their significance has certainly been affected by the change in those levels.

On the other hand, OPEC still supplies a major portion of the oil consumed by our Western European allies and by Japan. Price increases and demand declines have also brought about changes in oil inventory levels. Nevertheless, U.S. oil inventories, as of the beginning of March 1983, amounted to approximately 329 days of 1982 U.S. net import levels. Worldwide government strategic reserves have increased to some 650 million barrels, 309 million barrels are in the United States alone, in the strategic petroleum reserve. These Government reserves provide flexibility in dealing with potential disruptions. And total world inventory levels—although they have fallen from the peak reached in 1981—relative to consumption, they provide greater coverage than was available to us at the time of the Iranian revolution.

Future conditions in the world oil market, obviously are speculative; but the current levels of excess oil production capacity in the world will probably cause oil prices to continue to decline in real terms; how long that will continue depends on circumstances which are beyond our control. But certainly if we had no major disruptions, no significant changes, we would anticipate that this could continue for a year or two, or perhaps slightly longer.

However, the stimulative effects of this price decline on economic growth and oil demand could lead to a gradual firming of the oil market in the latter half of this decade, and perhaps much sooner.

The future remains subject to uncertainty in regard to the course of oil prices, levels of economic growth and the possibility of unexpected disruptions. As a result, we attempt to continue to exercise our vigilance to strengthen our energy emergency response programs here at home, and to work with our allies in the International Energy Agency to insure that we are properly prepared to meet any reasonable eventuality.

Mr. Chairman, that completes a summary of my opening statement. I will be happy to attempt to respond to the committee's questions.

The Strategic Petroleum Reserve Program

SECRETARY HODEL. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a prepared statement which I would like to submit for the record. [5]

MR. SHARP. We will certainly make that a part of the record.

SECRETARY HODEL. In the prepared statement we deal with a number of questions you raised in your opening statement, [6] as well as the questions raised in the letter inviting us to this hearing. Rather than going through those in detail, perhaps it would be appropriate if I summarize some of the points that I think are important, and then go to questions.

We are aware that when the administration came into office we had approximately 110 million barrels in the strategic petroleum reserve, and since that time the inventory has tripled to over 330 million barrels. At the present rate of fill, which will average 220,000 barrels a day for fiscal year 1983, [7] we will end this fiscal year with a total of 358 million barrels in the strategic petroleum reserve. We have already acquired the oil necessary to reach that level. We already have that under contract.

We are seeking currently to work with Congress to develop and adopt a plan which will provide a long-term stable, and agreed-upon fill rate which will complete the strategic petroleum reserve at the 750-million-barrel level that was originally targeted. We are currently in discussions about that with Members of Congress on both sides of the Capitol. We currently are proposing in those discussions that we would fill at a steady 145,000-barrel-a-day rate, not only in fiscal year 1984 but in future years, which would then bring us to the completion level of 750 million barrels just shortly after the close of calendar year 1990.

The 500-million-barrel level would be achieved during 1986, fiscal year 1986, which would be 1 year earlier than under the budget proposal we now have before Congress. The fiscal year 1984 budget proposal, which you referenced in your statement, proposed a fill rate of 145,000 barrels a day in fiscal year 1984 dropping to a flat rate of 100,000 barrels a day thereafter. That proposal would have gotten us to 500 million barrels 1 year later than our current proposal. In the course of following the 145,000-barrel-a-day proposal, we would be filling the strategic petroleum reserve to 95 percent of its capacity at all times. We would stay within that range throughout these years. That would leave us some flexibility, that 5-percent capacity would leave us some flexibility for spot purchases in very favorable circumstances or for some of the kinds of purchases we have entered into previously for reasons in addition to the filling of SPR such as our agreement with Mexico. Our proposal would also give us flexibility against any developmental problems that could occur, so we would not be in the position of having to use interim storage.

A graph attached to my testimony illustrates the relative position of the fill as proposed at 145,000 barrels a day and storage capacity. If this proposal is adopted, it would permit us to continue the fill of the strategic petroleum reserve without having to go to interim storage, and we think that that would be a positive step.

I would like to emphasize that the administration has demonstrated its concern for the security and safety of this Nation and its concern for national defense, and we have tried to evaluate the competing interests of extremely difficult budget deficit problems, as presented in the annual budget picture, and the need for continued fill rate. When we look at the numbers of dollars involved here in this program, and the rate at which we are filling the reserve, we think it is important to try to analyze how much insurance we want to pay and at what rate. That is how we look at the strategic petroleum reserve.

When as a nation we began the strategic petroleum reserve some 5 years ago our objective was to provide 750 million barrels in the strategic petroleum reserve at [6] The Chairman's opening statement is printed ibid., pp. 231–232.

[7] On December 1, 1982, President Reagan advised Congress that he did not intend to fill the Strategic Petroleum Reserve at the rate of 300,000 barrels per day, as stipulated in Section 160 (c)(1)(B) of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act of 1975, as amended by Section 4(a) of the Energy Emergency Preparedness Act of 1982. For text of the section, see 96 Stat. 251. For text of President Reagan's message to Congress, see American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1982, p. 273.

the end of the eighties in order to provide us protection against 8 to 11 million barrels a day of imports. None of our current projections bring us to those levels of import in the foreseeable future, so we find ourselves today very close to the level of protection that was anticipated at the end of the filling of the SPR. Currently we have 80 to 90 days of protection against virtually a total interruption of the supply of oil by imports, far ahead of where we thought we would be at this time. I believe, and I know you do as well, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a long-term drop in the consumption of oil, that will increase, and we expect imports to increase. Our projections are that the increased rate of imports will not reach the 8-million-barrel-a-day level in this decade. As a result, we see continued better protection from the reserve that we now have than we anticipated, and if we continue to fill as we are proposing at 145,000 barrels a day, it does bring us to the 750 million barrels at quite a rapid rate compared to the level of consumption.

I think with that, Mr. Chairman, I would be happy to stop and respond specifically to the questions you may wish to raise.

Statement by President Reagan, October 4, 1983 [8]

The National Energy Policy Plan

The U.S. energy situation today is significantly better than it was in 1981 when my administration took office.

Total energy efficiency has increased, domestic energy resources are being developed more effectively, oil prices have declined, U.S. dependence on foreign energy sources has diminished, and the Nation's vulnerability to energy supply disruptions has been reduced markedly, especially through additions to our Strategic Petroleum Reserve and through lower levels of oil imports. Only about 1/4 of our oil consumption this year is from imports, and less than half of that from OPEC. The real price of imported oil to the United States has fallen almost 40 percent.

A key factor contributing to today's improved U.S. energy situation is the implementation of a national energy policy first described in my 1981 National Energy Policy Plan. [9] This policy includes a goal, strategies for pursuing that goal, and federal programs and action determined by those strategies.

A hallmark of our national energy policy is to foster an adequate supply of energy at reasonable costs, minimize federal control and involvement in energy markets, and promote a balanced and mixed energy resource system.

I am proud of the actions we have taken since 1981 which have led to substantial progress and a reinvigorated national energy system.

We have removed price and allocation controls on crude oil and petroleum products. This has resulted in increased production of domestic resources and lower gasoline prices to consumers. Real gasoline prices are about 15 percent below pre-decontrol levels.

Since the end of 1980, the amount of oil stored in the Strategic Petroleum Reserve has tripled, to more than 360 million barrels today. It now holds about 90 days of our average net oil imports, and well over a year of our Arab OPEC imports. Together with private petroleum stockpiles, the SPR is an important part of our program for improving international energy security. It can be an invaluable form of insurance against the potentially severe effects of an oil supply interruption.

The world energy scene remains volatile. Even though we now produce about 90 percent as much energy as we consume, we need to press onward with improvements. The National Energy Policy Plan we transmit to Congress today [10] discusses all of our plans and accomplishments. But it emphasizes the need to finish the task of decontrolling natural gas. Today, the regulatory system has led to higher prices and lower supplies. Today we have unused capacity that natural gas control is restricting. That capacity could lower prices, reduce oil imports, and set us on a sensible course for the future. I will be working closely with the Senate and House in the weeks ahead to pass sensible natural gas legislation to allow the market to work.

We can face the energy future with confidence, not complacency. We must all continue to use energy prudently, and to improve our technology for finding and conserving energy. With the leadership of Secretary Hodel in the Energy Department, and under the guidance of the National Energy Policy Plan, we will continue to improve our energy situation, through the efforts and genius of the American people.

U.S. Readiness To Meet an Energy Emergency

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I will as you suggested give the highlights of my testimony. [12]

I think this hearing is timely because as events in the Middle East remind us again there is always the possibility of a supply disruption, and while no one can predict what events may transpire as a result of the Iran/Iraq war, we certainly can't rule out the possibility that the conflict could affect our energy supplies.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the United States is well prepared for an energy emergency. As Mr. Vaughan said, [13] we have a strategic petroleum reserve now of over 365 million barrels. We also have, through the IEA, a system of providing for participation with our allies in an international energy emergency sharing scheme, and the benefits of this system I think are quite significant.

First, the system can help mitigate the economic damage that would result from an interruption of oil imports. Under the terms of that system, our partners in the IEA guarantee that in a major oil crisis the United States will not absorb a greater portion of an oil supply shortage than that which they themselves are absorbing, and it has already been noted here this morning that in the 1973-1974 Arab boycott the United States was singled out, along with the Netherlands, for an embargo.

The second benefit of our participation in the IEA is in the area of national security interests. It has long been a fundamental tenet of our national security policy that our safety is linked inextricably to that of our allies in Western Europe and the Far East. Over the years we have made substantial sacrifices and investments in support of those alliances and in our view our commitment to the IEA and its sharing system is one of the smaller of those investments.

An interruption of major proportions in oil supplies could provoke a very divisive competition for oil supplies among us and our allies. Those of our allies who are more dependent upon imports than we are, would be under strong pressure to reach accommodations of the sort that could seriously affect our ability to deal with these situations.

The IEA sharing system was designed to reinforce our alliances at a time of energy crisis and to distribute the burden of dealing with supply disruptions in an equitable manner.

The third major benefit of our participation in the IEA is in the opportunity it provides for consultation and cooperation.

Let me just cite a very brief example of that sort of cooperation, and that is the Soviet gas pipeline affair. I won't go into the details, but through the IEA and the OECD a contentious and divisive problem was successfully resolved.

I think it is fair to conclude, Mr. Chairman, that our participation in the IEA is as relevant to our security interests today as it was when the agency was created in 1974.

Let me just say a few words about the recent allocations systems test of the IEA,[14] which Mr. Vaughan described in somewhat greater detail.[15]

I think we have to put this test into a reasonable perspective. There have been people and articles in the press that have attempted to draw conclusions from the test which are not warranted.

First of all, as Mr. Vaughan said, the exercise was a test of procedures and not policies. Second, the test was a training exercise and provided excellent exposure to the kinds of difficult decisions we would face in a real energy crisis.

I would not suggest, Mr. Chairman, that everything went perfectly in AST–4. There has been some criticism focused on what was perceived as the danger of exclusive reliance on price to restrain demand and a lack of commitment to the IEA that that exclusive reliance might imply.

We have reassured our IEA partners, Mr. Chairman, that in fact our commitment to the IEA is as strong as ever and that we fully intend to meet our obligations under the international energy program.

We do recognize that AST–4 highlighted the need for improvement in some areas of our response procedures, and I emphasize procedures, and we intend to pursue these expeditiously.

Briefly, Mr. Chairman, our reporting companies on the question of antitrust considerations have indicated that, in the absence of the protection afforded by EPCA 252,[16] they would not participate in the IEA's allocation information system. Extension of EPCA 252 as provided for in the legislation under discussion would permit us to continue to rely on the resource, know-how and efficiency of commercial enterprises to manage under Government supervision any oil movements which may be required.

Consequently, Mr. Chairman, we consider that extension of EPCA 252 is absolutely essential.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me just say that I think the United States is well protected against the worst effects of a major supply disruption but, at the same time, recent experience does provide us with opportunities to make further improvements in our emergency preparedness and we are working with the Department of Energy toward that end.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I will be happy to try to answer any questions.

[14] During May and June 1983 the International Energy Agency conducted its fourth allocations systems test (AST–4), which analyzed the emergency measures taken by participating countries in response to a hypothetical disruption of international oil supplies. The success of the test was largely determined by the ability of IEA members to share available supplies equitably. In addition to the 20 nations that comprise the IEA, 19 major oil companies and several states within the U.S. took part in the exercise. Documentation on the outcome of AST–4 is provided in the appendices of the published hearing.

[16] Section 252 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act of 1975 (EPCA 252) provides oil companies with immunity from antitrust laws in their efforts to carry out voluntary allocation agreements as part of an international energy program. For text of the section, see 89 Stat. 894.

E. Foreign Assistance and Third World Issues

Document 72

Address by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the Southern Center for International Studies, Atlanta, February 24, 1983 [1]

U.S. Security and Economic Assistance Policy

I appreciate your warm welcome. This is the fourth and fifth capital I've visited this month. Earlier I visited Tokyo, Seoul, and Peking. Today I'm happy to be in Atlanta, the capital of Georgia, and Atlanta, the capital of the South. I'm asked to say if there's anyone here who disputes that last designation, please see Andrew Young outside after the meeting.

A speech such as today's provides an opportunity to use a wide angle lens.

Although the broad picture is ever in our mind, the day to day business of the State Department generally finds us using —not the broad brush—but the jeweler's glass as we examine the myriad individual issues on which our foreign relations turn.

So today I want to begin by opening the lens full scope. I will describe the fundamental tenets which underlie President Reagan's foreign policy.

Then I plan to turn the lens down in two successive notches: first, a moderate turn to discuss the importance to our foreign policy of the more than 100 developing countries of the Third World—Asia, Africa, and South America.

Finally, I plan to focus way down and—in this time of tight budgets—discuss the funds which the United States must expend to achieve its objectives. Contrary to popular opinion, the currency of foreign affairs is not cookies. It takes resources—modest but sustained, applied credibly over time—to secure international peace, foster economic growth, and help ensure the well being of each of our citizens.

But let's start with the broader view.

Since inauguration day 2 years ago, President Reagan has sought to revitalize U.S. foreign policy. He is resolved to reduce a decade's accumulation of doubt about the United States' commitment and staying power. Our watchwords are four ideas that guide our actions:

—We start with realism.

—We build our strength.

—We stress the indispensable need to negotiate and reach agreements.

—We believe that progress is possible even though the tasks are difficult and complex.

Realism is the first requisite. If we are to improve the world, we must first understand it—the good and the bad. Much of present day reality is not pleasing. But describing conditions as we see them—as President Reagan has done over the course of his term—is not to seek confrontation. It is to point the way toward change and create the shared understandings which must precede change.

So when we've seen aggression, we've called it aggression. When we've seen subversion, we've so named it. When we've seen repression, we've called it repression.

Events in Poland and Afghanistan cannot be ignored or explained away. We have made clear to the Soviet Union in both public and private conversations that the lubricant for easing international tensions must be actions not just words. We've also not shied from raising problems—such as trade restrictions—with some of our closest allies. Realism in assessing the world's circumstances and clarity in articulating our views is fundamental, we believe, to rectifying problems.

The next requisite is strength: military, economic, and political. President Reagan has increased our defense budget in order to ensure that the United States, its allies, and its friends have the means to deter aggression. We seek increased funds to reinforce the bulwarks which presage peace. I am confident that the people and the Congress will continue to support the President's program of preparedness.

Economic strength is of similar weight. Clearly, the recession of the past two years has produced severe strains. The world is coming through a period of painful decompression from the inflationary surge of the 1970's. This has left us with problems of high unemployment, large public sector deficits, and the heavy debt burden of some developing nations.

The number one remedy for alleviating these problems is restarting noninflationary growth. The United States, I believe, is poised for a healthy expansion. But the United States can not be the single locomotive which pulls the whole world up. We must act in concert with other industrialized countries to spur investment, improve productivity, and restore economic strength.

Beyond the economy and our defense forces, the bedrock of U.S. strength is our political values: a free press, free trade unions, free political parties, and the rule of laws. To the extent we live these values, we proclaim them. And to the extent we proclaim them—as President Reagan has done in his initiative to enhance the spread of democracy—we offer a way out to the many whose lives are politically and economically repressed. This administration is dedicated to strengthening the world's commitment to democracy as a fundamental reflection, and reinforcement, of our own strength.

Negotiation is our third watchword. My early professional experience was in the labor field. From those early days down to my most recent talks in Peking, I remain convinced of the efficacy of negotiations. Today, we are negotiating—earnestly, searchingly—in the Middle East and in the arms reduction talks. Both efforts are proceeding slowly against a promise of tremendous potential pay-off.

But in addition, underneath these well publicized talks, we are talking on dozens of other issues around the world. In fact one of the most significant and little noted changes in the past 30 years is how extensive the world machinery for consultations has become. Name an international issue—large or small—and there is probably established international machinery for adjudicating, or at least working on it.

We are not yet a world at peace, but we are in many ways a world at talk. And this is an encouraging circumstance.

Realism, strength, and negotiation—coupled with optimism that progress is possible: These are the lamps which light this administration's approach to foreign affairs. They apply to our dealings with our European allies, and to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. They apply also to our dealings with the Third World—the subject to which I now turn.

Many of our citizens still see the developing countries as accessories to our basic interests. But over the past two decades, these countries have increasingly moved to the front of the stage where issues of peace and prosperity are played out

I believe this trend has assumed such proportions that I can advance two fundamental propositions:

—First there will be no enduring economic prosperity for our country without economic growth in the Third World.

—Second, there will not be security and peace for our citizens without stability and peace in the developing countries.

Let me explain.

For the past 15 years, until the current recession took its toll, the developing countries as a whole have been growing more rapidly than the United States and Europe. As they have grown, they've become increasingly important as customers and suppliers for ourselves and other industrial nations.

In 1980, developing countries purchased about 40 percent of U.S. exports—more than bought by Western Europe, Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union, and China combined. These countries have accounted for more than half the growth in U.S. exports since 1975. At this juncture, approximately 1 out of every 20 workers in our manufacturing plants and 1 out of every 5 acres of our farmland produce for Third World markets.

The current worldwide recession has vividly—if painfully—highlighted these relationships. In the past several years growth rates in the developing countries have dropped from over 5 percent per year to around 2 percent. Partly as a result, our exports to these countries—which were increasing at more than 30 percent a year in the late 1970's—have tapered off. For example, in the first eight months of 1982, U.S. exports to Mexico dropped 26 percent, to Chile 59 percent, and to Thailand 25 percent. Every $1.0 billion decline in U.S. exports has erased 60,000 to 70,000 U.S. jobs.

Today some of the workers in our unemployment lines and some of the businesses and farms on the auction block are living, if unwanted, proof that the well-being of our citizens is linked to the well-being of citizens in the Third World.

On the other side of the trade ledger, the developing countries supply about 40–45 percent of the goods which we import for our factories and consumers. Although we are richer in minerals than most industrialized countries, the Third World supplies more than half the bauxite, tin, and cobalt used by U.S. industry. For some 11 other strategic metals and minerals, the developing countries supply more than half of our imports. For some natural products, such as rubber, coffee, cocoa, and hard fibers, the Third World supplies everything we use.

This intertwining of the European and our economy with those of the Third World will increase in the 1980's and 1990's. As the recession fades, we can expect the faster growing countries—particularly in Asia, but also in South America—to resume their role as engines of growth in the world economy. They will open up new opportunities for our exports and jobs for our citizens. We have an abiding interest in fostering this growth.

It is for this reason that we are joining with other industrial nations to add funds to the IMF. These funds are critical to helping debt-plagued developing countries make painful, but unavoidable adjustments in their economies and thereby resume healthy growth rates. We have a direct stake in their success.

For this reason also we resist—and call on all Americans to resist—pleas for further protectionism. Putting up barriers to imports will only result in losing markets for our exports and paying higher prices for goods. Resorting to protectionism as an antidote to recession is like turning to alcohol to ward off the cold. It may feel good at first, but it shortly becomes corrosive. The tonic for our ills is noninflationary growth—not stiff draughts of old Smoot-Hawley.

Beyond the demands of economics, the Third World is fundamental to our aspirations for security and peace.

Since 1950, most of the major threats to international stability, and the chief opportunities for expansion of the Soviet Union's political reach, have come in the Third World. The headlines have rung with now familiar names: Korea in 1950, Dien Bien Phu in 1954, Suez in 1956, Cuba in 1962, and more recently Iran, Angola, Afghanistan, Kampuchea, El Salvador, and Ethiopia.

A study by the Brookings Institution has identified no fewer than 185 incidents since the end of World War II when U.S. military forces were sent to developing countries to meet situations which threatened our political or economic interests.[2] As we speak today, 1,200 marines are on duty in Lebanon helping again to patch the torn fabric of peace.

The point is clear. The fault line of global instability runs strongly across the continents of the Third World.

This instability is inimical to our security in many ways. Small incidents can flare into larger conflagrations and potentially into confrontations between the superpowers. Korea and Cuba teach this lesson well.

More subtly, the Soviet Union and its allies are able to feed on political instability like viruses on a host. Some of the most significant uses by the Soviets of military power since World War II have been in the developing world. The Soviet deployment of a deepwater navy, an airlift capacity, and mobile ground forces have given them the ability to intervene when they perceive opportunities.

In addition, the Soviet Union supports 870,000 troops in North Korea—60 percent more than maintained by South Korea. It bankrolls the Vietnamese army which has positioned 180,000 troops directly on the border of Thailand. It supports 55,000 Cuban troops in Angola, Ethiopia, and Mozambique. The Soviet Union is the largest purveyor of arms to the Third World. In 1981, they supplied about three times as many tanks, aircraft, and artillery pieces as did the United States.

We cannot ignore these realities as they challenge our national interests.

Strategically, some of the least secure Third World countries are sources of critical raw materials or lie astride sea lanes which carry our military forces and world commerce. The premier example is the Persian Gulf. About 32 percent of the free world's oil supplies is pumped there. The region is vital to the economic and political security of Europe, Japan, and the United States. It is in our interest to build stability in this region, and thereby help assure access to those supplies.

As a parenthetical remark, I want to mention my belief that the recent decline in oil prices—and the possibility of further declines—will spur the free world's economic recovery. For some countries—such as Venezuela and Mexico—cheaper oil admittedly means tougher times. But it will be good for most of us. I have seen one illustrative estimate that a decline in oil prices to $20 per barrel would boost real growth rates in the industrial countries by up to 1 1/2 percent. A less steep decline would have proportionately positive effects.

What would be harmful over the long-term is if oil prices resume the yo-yo gyrations we've experienced in the last decade. For this reason, the United States has an interest in helping oil importing developing countries, such as the Philippines and Thailand, improve their energy development programs and further reduce worldwide dependence on OPEC.

The job of building our security also requires that we maintain military facilities and strengthen indigenous defense forces around the world. This includes U.S. bases in the Philippines, and in Turkey, the Azores, Morocco, and other strategically placed countries.

The United States cannot defend its interests by operating out of the United States and Europe alone. We need the cooperation of countries in the Third World to grant transit, refueling, and base rights. Otherwise, while we may wish to build up a rapid deployment force, we will be unable to deploy it without Third World friends who will allow us to use their facilities. We must be prepared, in turn, to help these key countries achieve their aspirations for security and economic growth. This is not just a short-term proposition. The process of mutual cooperation weaves ties of interdependence and friendship which will redound to our benefit in years to come.

It goes without saying that the least desirable method for preserving our strategic interests and ensuring stability in the developing countries is by sending in U.S. forces. The 185 incidents which I mentioned earlier represent—in essence—185 failures to resolve problems by more measured means. If we are to reduce incidents in the future, we need a significant program—sustained over time—to secure peace and economic well-being in regions vital to our security.

In fact, we have such a program. It is called the U.S. Security and Development Cooperation Program. Although our administration has clarified its goals and sharpened its focus, it is essentially the same program endorsed by every U.S. President since Harry Truman. It's frequently called foreign aid and all too often depicted as a giveaway. But that is a misnomer. The program's purpose is to create those conditions of growth, security and freedom in developing countries which serve the fundamental interests of each U.S. citizen.

Let me give some examples of how it works.

Our highest priority in this program is bringing peace to the Middle East. Because of the ties between the United States and Israel, a crisis in this region has always placed us in the center of a potentially serious world confrontation. This has been so for more than 25 years. Achieving a lasting peace in the Middle East will not only benefit each and every citizen in those lands, but will ease one of the fundamental threats to world peace and our own security.

Making peace there means more than holding talks—as vital at these are. Sustained economic growth is needed in Israel, Egypt, and Jordan. Lebanon needs to open roads, restore electrical service, restart its economic engines, and resume its place as a stable and friendly nation in that part of the world. These countries also need to be able to defend themselves against those they see as aggressors. In this circumstance, we and other nations provide both economic and military aid. This aid is indispensable to the peace process.

Another program—with particular bearing here in the South—is the President's Caribbean Basin Initiative. Some of you have dealt directly with the consequences of poverty, political turmoil, and Soviet/Cuban interventionism near our shores. These have come in human form—off airplanes and out of boats to present in person their claims for a better deal. For the South, the need to help the Caribbean and Central American nations grow economically and build democratic insitutions is not an abstract issue. It is one which can directly affect your economy and society.

Another part of our program is helping curb the rampant population growth which underlies much of the Third World's poverty and threatens our planet's resource base. The arithmetic is inexorable. Before World War II there were more than 2 billion people in the world. Now there are 4.3 billion. Even though growth rates have slowed in recent years, 17 years from now—in the year 2000—there will be 6 billion. If we act effectively, the world population may stabilize at between 12 and 16 billion in the last half of the next century. That's 12–16 billion people to feed, clothe, and provide jobs for.

To bring it closer to home, Mexico currently has 62 million people. If they are able to lower their birth rate to the two child per family level in the first twenty years of the next century, they will have "only" about 250 million people when their population stops growing.

Faced with these numbers, the United States provides direct technical advice and training to 27 countries to assist them mount voluntary family planning programs. It's been an effective effort. We have a deep interest in continuing it.

Similarly, we provide funds for U.S. agricultural universities to help developing countries grow more food. Although there are food surpluses now, population increase, plus growth in the world economy, means that food production in the developing countries must keep growing at 3–4 percent per year or we may all face shortages and rising prices again by the end of the decade.

So with U.S. funds, Mississippi State is introducing improved seed in Thailand. The University of Florida is increasing crop production in Ecuador. Auburn is working in Jamaica and Indonesia on fish production. It is in all our interests that these universities, and others across our agricultural heartland, continue with our support to devote some of their considerable talents to building secure food supplies in the world.

Let me give one more example—this time on the security side. A glance at the map indicates the importance of Turkey to our strategic interests. It sits like a wedge between the Soviet Union, the Middle East, and the western flank of the Persian oil fields. With Iran and Iraq in turmoil, the importance of an economically and militarily strong Turkey has increased. In the last few years, the Russians have increased the size of their forces stationed north of Turkey.

Hence, we and other countries of Europe, led by the Germans, are helping the Turks spur their economy and replace obsolete tanks and other equipment in their armed forces. The cost to us of assisting Turkey maintain strong defense forces between Russia and the Middle East is less than one-sixth of the cost of maintaining U.S. soldiers overseas for the same purpose.

These are examples of how an investment of our resources contributes to the well-being and security of each of us in this room. The cost is modest. For the coming fiscal year, the examples I've given will cost each U.S. citizen the following in tax dollars:

For building peace in the Middle East	$12.35 per person
For the Caribbean Basin	$ 3.84 per person
For curbing population growth	$ .92 per person
For building secure food supplies	$ 3.15 per person
For helping Turkey	$ 1.77 per person

The total cost in tax dollars for all our security and economic assistance programs in the developing countries is $43.91 per person. By contrast we Americans spend $104 per person a year for TV and radio sets, $35 per person per year for barbershops and beauty parlors, $97 per person per year for soap and cleaning supplies, and $21 per person per year for flowers and potted plants.

I'm not belittling any of these e: ● ıses. They're part of our commerce which provides us with jobs as producers and satisfactions as consumers. I am trying to establish some relative values.

Every American must understand that it's neccessary to spend a fraction of our collective resources to secure our most precious goals of freedom, economic well-being, and peace. An esteemed son of Georgia and predecessor of mine, Dean Rusk, said it succinctly: "Freedom is not free."

Let me close by opening my lens back up and reverting to the fourth of the tenets which guide our conduct of foreign affairs: namely, our conviction that progress is possible.

We Americans have lived for over 40 years in a tumultuous world in which we have pursued four basic goals:

—First, building world peace and deterring war—above all, nuclear war which would threaten human existence.

—Second, containing the influence of nations which are fundamentally opposed to our values and interests—notably the Soviet Union and its allies.

—Third, fostering a growing world economy, and protecting U.S. access to free markets and critical resources.

—And fourth, encouraging other nations to adopt principles of self-determination, economic freedom, and the rule of law which are the foundation stones of American society.

In these endeavors, we have had some signal successes. Some formerly troubled countries of the world—for instance the countries of East Asia—are now relatively strong and prosperous. West Europe, a cockpit of warring nationalities for a century, has been at peace for 37 years. Progress has been made in fundamental areas affecting the mass of mankind: better health, longer life expectancy, more schooling, increased income. We have a chance in the coming year to make major strides in fashioning peace in the Middle East.

Americans as a people are pragmatists—suspicious of grand assurances or easy promises. But I'm convinced that if we persevere—proceeding realistically, backed by strength, fully willing to negotiate and search for agreement—we will achieve successes in the future.

Address by the Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Wallis) Before a Session Sponsored by the International Development Conference, May 18, 1983 [3]

U.S. International Development Policy

I am honored to have this opportunity to address you. Clearly, the focus of this conference—World Development In Perspective: What Can America Do?—is significant and, judging from the size of this evening's group, generates considerable interest. It is also particularly timely, since the Williamsburg economic summit and the UNCTAD VI conference [4] are fast approaching.

Many people respond to the question, what can America do about world development, by talking only of the tangible things we do, especially emphasizing foreign aid. It is easy to make that mistake if one sees development only in terms of money. Others make the mistake of relating it only to compassion and believe that aid will cause deserts to bloom, industries to spring up, commerce to flourish, and well-being to rise miraculously. Still others see the only path to rapid development in collectivism, through which they can impose social, religious, or national goals, regardless of the cost in individual liberty and cultural traditions.

[3] Source: Current Policy No. 485, May 18, 1983, Bureau of Public Affairs, Department of State. The conference was held in Washington.

[4] Reference is to the Sixth U.N. Conference on Trade and Development, held in Belgrade, June 6–July 3, 1983.

The real essence of development is different from all of these things. The foundation of development lies in the meaning, aspirations, and worth of each individual. Its realization is in human fulfillment, in the opportunity for all men and women to realize freely their full potential—to make the most of their God-given talents. President Reagan put it this way in his October 1981 speech to the Philadelphia World Affairs Council:

"We Americans can speak from experience on this subject. When the original settlers arrived here, they faced a wilderness where poverty was their daily lot, danger and starvation their close companions. But through all the dangers, disappointments, and setbacks, they kept their faith. They never stopped believing that with the freedom to try and try again, they could make tomorrow a better day. . . .

"Free people build free markets that ignite dynamite development for everyone; and that's the key, but that's not all. Something else helped us create these unparalleled opportunities for growth and personal fulfillment. A strong sense of cooperation; free association among individuals, rooted in institutions of family, church, school, press, and voluntary groups of every kind. Government too played an important role. It helped eradicate slavery and other forms of discrimination. It opened up the frontier through actions like the Homestead Act and rural electrification. And it helped provide a sense of security for those who, through no fault of their own, could not support themselves." [5]

What President Reagan was saying was that government properly does those things that open up opportunities for individuals and that allow natural incentives to operate in freedom. That is quite different from a government that tries to compel and command people to fit into a preconceived mold, keeping them in submission and dependence. It is no accident that those countries that have allowed free play for personal initiative and economic rewards for success now produce more than one-half of the world's product. Furthermore, those developing countries in the Third World that have recently been growing the fastest are precisely those that have increased the economic freedom of their people.

Thus the most important contribution that the United States can make to world development is to carry to the governments and peoples of the less developed countries (LDCs) the message of our experience—to explain to them its lessons. The sooner they turn their backs on the false claims and real failures of socialism, the sooner they reject the philosophy of compulsion, coercion, and command, the sooner will they open the way to accelerated, meaningful development. This message is the foundation of a program that helps other countries help themselves.

In ensuring development, possessing resources for growth is not enough. The resources must be effectively used. Unfortunately, there are far too many cases in which countries have squandered precious resources in questionable investments or in subsidizing consumption. In other cases, the most precious resource of all—human initiative—has not been given the freedom to make the kinds of economic decisions which can lead to dynamic and prosperous economic growth. The most critical contribution these countries can make to their development lies in pursuing appropriate domestic economic policies. This, I may add, is equally true for the United States.

Accordingly, U.S. policy to stimulate economic growth in the developing world must encourage countries to adopt market-oriented policies. We focus attention on the role of the private sector—domestic as well as foreign—for mobilizing and effectively utilizing resources for development. Fortunately, there appears to be increased recognition in both developed and developing nations of the role of appropriate economic policies. We are continuing to encourage movement in this direction—directly through bilateral discussions and indirectly through the international financial institutions.

Building on these basic principles, there are tangible steps the United States is taking, and can enlarge upon, to facilitate world development. No country has a better record than our own for positive measures—public and private—that contribute to the strength of the world economy and to growth in the less developed countries.

[5] For text, see American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1981, pp. 63–69.

In discussing positive U.S. measures to promote development in the Third World, I begin from a basic premise: In addressing the economic difficulties and prospects of the developing world, restoring sustained noninflationary economic growth in the United States is the single most significant contribution we can make. The reason for that can be seen from a few statistics.

In 1981 the United States purchased more than $120 billion in goods and services from developing countries. To be sure, a significant amount of this is accounted for by petroleum products. Nevertheless, U.S. purchases amounted to nearly 20 percent of all the exports of those LDCs that do not export oil and to 35 percent of all their exports to developed nations. The growth in U.S. imports of manufactured goods from the developing countries has been impressive. During the 1970s, these imports grew at an average rate of 27 percent per year; in other words, they doubled every 32 months, on the average. The United States now absorbs over half of all the manufactured exports that non-oil LDCs sell to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) countries, even though the U.S. market is only one-third of the total OECD market. That means that we take 50 percent more than our proportionate share. When you consider the billions of dollars of imports from the developing world by the United States alone, not to mention the imports from the other developed countries, direct aid pales by comparison.

In the long run, it is only through trade that the developing world will be able to earn the external resources it needs for its development. In view of the magnitudes we are dealing with, and of the U.S. role as the developing world's largest customer, we have a responsibility to the rest of the world, as well as to ourselves, to ensure that there is sustained real economic growth in the United States. Correspondingly, as the world's largest trading nation, we must make every effort to ensure that the global trading system is open so that the developing world and the developed world will benefit from, and contribute to, each other's growth.

Fortunately, the United States appears to be well on the road to sustained noninflationary growth. For the past two decades, our government has overspent, overtaxed, and overregulated. Our growth rate declined. Inflation began to creep, then to run, and then to gallop. Interest rates rose to almost unprecedented heights. The bold measures of the Reagan Administration have now turned the tide. For a while it appeared to some doubting Thomases that Ronald Reagan would prove to be another King Canute. But, as the President says, he knows that his policies are turning the tide because the press no longer refers to his policies as "Reaganomics."

The short-term costs of turning the tide were high, but now inflation and interest rates are down, the leading economic indicators are up, and investor and consumer confidence are returning. The United States is doing its part in ensuring a long-term global economic recovery. Furthermore, despite the economic difficulties of the past few years and the pressure for protectionist trade measures, the United States remains an essentially open market.

The United States is unique in being the world's largest free trade area and one of the most open to world markets; a number of other countries have discovered the same ingredient of success. Like the United States, these countries—advanced developing countries and newly industrialized countries—also contribute through trade to the growth of the LDCs. Their recent growth has been the fastest in the world, and their growing imports are a spur to growth in the other countries they trade with.

Closely related to trade in terms of long-term U.S. impact on development is private investment. In addition to providing additional financial resources to developing countries, foreign investment promotes long-term growth by providing technology, management know-how, and access to international markets. Here, too, the United States has an excellent record. In the 1970's, U.S. investment in developing countries accounted for more than half of total investment by OECD countries in these nations. In the latter half of the past decade, U.S. direct private investment in the developing countries grew at approximately 20 percent per year. In 1981, reflecting the general economic climate, the rate of growth of U.S. investment abroad dropped but still continued at around 5 percent. By the end of 1981, U.S. direct investment in developing countries had reached the impressive level of $56 billion.

Up to now I have discussed the developing countries as if they were all alike. Clearly, however, these countries differ greatly among themselves. Any effective and realistic policy must differentiate among countries and tailor development strategies to the needs and potentials of individual countries and regions. While classification is always somewhat arbitrary, we have frequently found it useful in Washington to recognize several groups of developing countries.

The first group consists of the oil-exporting countries, which have capital surpluses. To achieve their ambitious plans for development, these countries need prosperity in the industrial economies so they can sell their oil and invest their surpluses there.

Then there are the so-called newly industrialized countries. These nations, through their own efforts and a favorable economic climate, which has permitted great increases in exports and substantial inflows of capital, have achieved dramatic growth.

Next there is a larger growth of countries, sometimes referred to as middle-income developing countries, which have achieved some progress but still have widespread poverty. These countries, which in most cases are dependent on exports of one or two commodities, have suffered as the global recession has reduced their exports in both quantity and price. More than renewed growth in the industrial countries is required, however, if these countries are to prosper. Significant adjustments in their economies also are needed.

The fourth group contains the very poorest developing countries. These suffer widespread poverty and play only a minor role in the global economy. They lack the basic infrastructure to compete effectively in world markets so cannot attract investment and financing. If self-sustaining growth is to be achieved within a reasonable time, they need charity. Frequently, their economic and governmental policies are so bad that charity, or "aid," is simply futile. In our assistance to these countries, we concentrate in three areas where over the years the United States has developed special competence, namely, food and agriculture, energy, and health and education. We try to use our aid in ways which encourage economic reforms, which in turn attract private investments.

Of course, I would mislead you if I let it seem that aid to the poorest developing countries is the most important help we can give them. On the contrary, in their case as in others, trade is more important than aid, because trade helps them to help themselves. We have a special program by which their goods come to the U.S. market duty-free, called the generalized system of preferences (GSP). Although the amount of trade affected by this program is small in terms of the U.S. market, it is a large and important spur to development in those countries that export to us with its stimulus.

Even these groupings of countries are partly misleading, however, because they mask the individuality and uniqueness of each country. We base our specific programs on careful study and consultation with the government and people of each country itself. We listen, we learn, we identify problems, and we work out solutions jointly with them.

A few comments on direct aid are in order. Despite the economic upturn that is under way in the United States and some other countries, the outlook for substantial increases in direct aid is not bright. It is unlikely that the decade of the 1980s will see increases in foreign aid comparable to those of the 1970s. Calls by some developing nations for massive gifts are completely unrealistic. Budgetary conditions in the United States and in other major donor nations simply preclude it.

This makes it all the more important that we focus our limited funds on those countries where it will do the most good. How much good our aid does depends not so much on how badly the recipients need it as on how well they use it. Aid, to be effective, must open the way to expand trade and attract investment. It cannot do that in the face of unsound governmental policies that do not support free markets, protect private property, and maintain a rule of law and political stability.

This means that the relative role of concessional aid is diminishing. In fact, this aid is increasing, but trade and borrowing in private markets are increasing much faster. These latter two contributions to development deserve the emphasis that I gave them, but I would be negligent if I failed to mention the way that direct aid fits into the picture. In line with what I have just been saying, the United States works closely with host governments on economic policy problems important to development. We encourage sound agricultural policies on pricing, credit, and freedom of enterprise.

Furthermore, about half of our development aid goes to food and agriculture. Besides encouraging more private initiative, we contribute to the fundamental research and to the development of new applied technology, in the role that government is most qualified to fill. A major part of our aid also goes to public health and population control programs. By concentrating our aid in recent years on the activities in which government makes a unique contribution, we have made its effectiveness grow rapidly even though its amount grew relatively slowly.

The United States has also concentrated its aid increasingly where it is most needed—in the least developed countries, as I noted earlier. Our contributions to multilateral development banks in Asia, Latin America, and Africa are permitting growth rates of lending of 14%–15% per year. The United States continues to be the largest provider of official development aid, and over two-thirds of our aid goes to the poorest countries.

No discussion of Third World Development can ignore the serious debt problems which a number of developing nations now face. During the past decade, borrowing in private capital markets became an increasingly important source of financing for many developing countries, particularly the middle- and upper-income ones. As the borrowing climate changed and the world slipped into a prolonged recession, a number of nations came face-to-face with serious debt problems.

Several steps must be taken if these debt problems are to be resolved in a durable way.

—Sound economic policies must be pursued in the debtor countries. These should include sound debt monitoring and management. The World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) provide valuable assistance in this. It is, obviously, important that neither developed nor developing nations impose new barriers to trade.

—Financial resources must continue to be provided by the international community to support the adjustment of borrowing countries to sound policies. Here the IMF plays a major role. The increases in IMF quotas that are now being considered by Congress are essential.

—The governments and central banks of lending countries must be prepared to provide short-term, transitional financing to fill the gap until IMF programs are in place.

—Commercial banks and export credit agencies must continue a flow of finance to debtor countries that are undertaking sound, IMF-supported adjustment programs.

—Sustained noninflationary economic growth must take place in developing nations.

Now I would like to outline for you what the United States hopes to accomplish with regard to development at the May 28–30 economic summit in Williamsburg and during the June UNCTAD VI conference in Belgrade.

First, we hope that the summit will confirm that the West's major economies are working effectively toward a restoration of sustainable noninflationary growth. We hope also that the participating countries will commit themselves to a rollback of restrictions on trade which they have introduced in response to the difficult world economic situation. If these developments occur, it will be a major step toward achieving a healthier world economy. In turn, the developing countries will have an opportunity in Belgrade to take similar actions that will restore confidence in global recovery.

Second, we expect that Williamsburg will heighten awareness of the interrelations among trade, finance, and development. The specific relations I refer to are four:

—Between an open international trading system and sustainable noninflationary economic growth;

—Between open international markets and solution of the debt problems of developing countries and, specifically, the link between their ability to export and their ability to service debt;

—Between short-term financing needed to maintain essential imports, and the economic adjustments they must make, in many developing countries; and —Between growth in developed countries and growth in developing countries.

As for UNCTAD VI, the United States, drawing on the discussions at the Williamsburg summit, will emphasize the linkages I have mentioned earlier and draw the attention of the developing world to the fact that effective North-South economic relations hinge on mutual responsibilities and benefits in sustaining and improving an open international trading and financial system. We will focus attention also on the indispensable role of free markets in mobilizing energies and resources and more generally on the importance of sound economic policies. [6]

The United States views UNCTAD as a significant major forum for discussions of development issues. We do not, however, generally regard UNCTAD as a suitable forum for negotiating in detail specific development measures. In our view, negotiations of measures to ameliorate current economic difficulties or strengthen the existing trade or financial system are more properly handled within the specialized independent international agencies designed to address these issues—for example the IMF, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), and the World Bank.

Our discussions with less developed countries and with others at UNCTAD can make significant progress toward the solutions of real problems if there is genuine dialogue and a willingness to listen to each others' points of view. Therefore, in our preliminary discussions with other governments in preparation for UNCTAD, we are working hard to assure that the conference will take place in a cooperative atmosphere rather than one of needless polarization, which would sacrifice the opportunity for agreement. We emphasize that progress lies through recognition of the principle of mutual benefit through general growth, and that developmental discussions will achieve the most when they have a practical orientation aimed toward finding and correcting the real obstacles to development, case-by-case, or toward discovering unexploited opportunities. Cooperative efforts can then remove those obstacles or open up those opportunities. It is also important to recognize that, as a general rule, the international specialized agencies, such as the IMF and the World Bank, can make important contributions in their areas of expertise.

In summary, the most important single source of growth and development is the talents of individuals, allowed to develop fully and freely by free institutions. Government provides the framework—the protection of law and the assurance of opportunity—within which individuals can reach their full potential and contribute to national development. This framework permits trade to flourish, both domestic and international. When many countries have open, free economies, they reinforce each other while sharing the benefits of growth and development. Thus, open economies with free-flowing trade and private investment, both in developed and developing countries, provide the one sure route to rapid development of the less developed countries. Because of the difficult adjustments now necessary in the developing world, because of the heavy debts and the hangover from the binge of inflation in the past decade, open economies and free-flowing private investment are especially important to recovery and to the resumption of rapid development. Direct aid between countries also will play an important, though secondary, role.

The most important thing is to keep our economies free—both developed and less developed—and to support and maintain the sound international institutions that play a supporting role during this period of adjustment. Keeping to this sound course will permit the recovery now firmly under way to have the maximum effect on the welfare of our people and of people in the developing world.

Statement by the Administrator of the Agency for International Development (McPherson) Before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, July 26, 1983 [7]

U.S. Foreign Assistance and World Hunger

It is good to be before this committee once more.

The central focus and really the driving mission of AID is to deal with world hunger, and so I look forward to testifying here today.

That central focus is true in a narrow sense, in that over 50 percent of the development assistance budget goes for food production, and of course we supervise or manage the Public Law 480 program [8] in the field. But it is also true in a broader sense, in that most of what we do at AID is focused on trying to help poor people earn more income. And earning more income is really the key to having people have more food.

Let me talk a moment about the status of hunger in the world.

The definition of what is hunger, what is malnutrition, as you know, is an issue in tremendous dispute among professionals. But I think we do know that the percentage of people in the world today who are hungry is less than it was 10 years ago. However, the number, the actual number of hungry people, is greater today than it was 10 years ago. That is of course because of the population increase.

It [I] alluded to the causes of hunger a moment ago, but let me spend a few more moments on this.

I think there have been several references here this morning to the fact that enough food is produced in the world, but that the hungry people simply don't have access to the food. I think it is important to underline that in many cases it is not the logistics of distribution per se, but rather, it is the lack of income in the hands of those people which results in hunger.

The international charity system is, in fact, better organized and more efficient than it was 10 or 15 years ago. The communication network of the world, of course, is much better; so we know more quickly where the problems are and how to respond to them.

It is obvious, though, that the poor and the hungry of the world don't want to live on, or be dependent for their existence on international charity. What we need to do once more to help the poor is to help them figure more how to earn more income. We need more self-help efforts.

To take an example, the landless people in most poor countries are the most desperately poor and most hungry. It is unlikely in most countries that they are going to get land. Farmland in many countries is already broken up into very small lots. The landless, therefore, need either to find work on small farms in the areas that are prosperous enough to hire them, or they need to find jobs in urban areas. What is needed, in fact, is the creation of opportunities so the landless can earn an income.

In the last few years, and the last couple of years particularly, AID has done an enormous amount of thinking and working to put into place projects on how to have poor people increase their incomes.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that the bread for the world legislation passed last year, in directing AID to think through what it was doing in terms of helping poor and hungry people, has been helpful in our focusing on this problem and working through it.

How do we create economic growth? How do we create opportunities for poor people to make more money?

It seems to me that we have learned a great deal in the 30 or so years that the U.S. Government has been in this business. I think we know that the key ingredients are, one, trained people, people who can do things; two, institutions in which those trained people can work in; three, technology of which the people in institutions can make use; and lastly, a policy context—policies of the government of the country which will encourage economic growth.

When those aspects are in place, by and large the resources for economic growth are available. I won't say always, but by and large they are there. Trained people, institutions, technology, and a proper policy context will almost always create an economic growth situation.

There are some fabulous examples of success that really need to be focused on.

I would say one of the most historically dramatic is India. In the mid-1950's all of us periodically heard about the terrible droughts and massive starvation in various parts of India. It was the basket case, or almost so, of the day. Then India produced about 50 million tons of grain a year. Last year they produced 152 million tons of grain, and that was even though they had substantial droughts in parts of the country.

This dramatic change, this tremendous increase in production, really needs to be analyzed closely.

Problems remain. In particular, these are problems of income distribution among the population. But the facts are that most Indians, certainly a vast majority are better off today because of their country's great increase in food production.

Why did it happen? What took place?

Well, we Americans can be proud that we contributed quite a lot to this. We helped, for example, create the miracle rice and miracle wheat that helped in this production increase. This is the technology that the Indians needed.

We helped build with the Indians an extensive system of education and agricultural extension. We helped put together an irrigation system which is still being expanded. The irrigation system, incidentally, helped stabilize production even when there was drought.

The Indians, of course, had a good strong program to put this together. The key, in my judgment, was when the Indians substantially raised the price of wheat so the farmers had an incentive to increase production.

There are other examples, such as Korea, Indonesia, Taiwan, Thailand, Sri Lanka, the Philippines, Colombia, Costa Rica, and Tunisia—where much has also been done.

Around the world there has been substantial progress, particularly in Asia, the Near East, and Latin America.

The situation in Africa, however, is really very bad. In fact, it has deteriorated. The average person in sub-Saharan Africa has fewer calories today than 5, 10 years ago. And indeed that trend appears to be continuing. Per capita food production in sub-Saharan Africa, in fact, has declined almost every year for the last 10 years. Now the population has increased, which is an important part of all this. But it is not totally a population problem.

The facts are that the donor community and the Africans simply have not done it right. That may be too sweeping. But a lot of what the donor community did in the 1970's was a resource transfer program. They thought of Africa as Asia, or Latin America. The facts are that Africa did not in 1970 and still does not have the trained people in place. They don't have the institutions, the extension systems, the businesses, the production entities or the physical infrastructure. They don't have, very importantly, the policy context.

The facts are that in country after country in Africa, the governments discriminate against their poorest people. There is no other way to say it. They discriminate in this way: The poorest people are almost always the farmers, but city people are the ones who riot and turn over governments. So what do African governments do? They give the city people cheap food.

And how do they finance the cheap food? They are too poor to finance it the way the Europeans might. The way they do it is to hold down the prices paid to farmers for food they produce. In many countries they hold it to half of world market prices. In effect, they tax the farmer, often their poorest population, half his production.

Now, farmers all over the world are pretty smart people. They understand when they cannot make money by producing more. They also understand the uselessness of buying fertilizer to improve their yields when they do not get a return sufficient to cover the costs for what they already produce.

So, what you find in Africa is a situation where production on a per capita basis has gone down and continues to go down.

What have we been trying to do about this? The pattern is clear. It is not just AID that has been saying this. The World Bank, in the Berg report,[9] laid this out vividly. Dr. Berg, by the way, is the key economist these days on the Carlucci commission[10] helping us to think through our whole foreign assistance program.

What are we doing?

We are saying that resource transfers won't do. We are looking at research. Sorghum and millet, for example, are the key crops of the Sahel. They are the poor people's crop. But because they are not commercial crops in the sense that wheat and rice are, there has been almost no research on producing higher variety yields of sorghum and millet. When I was on BIFAD a few years ago, we began a sorghum and millet research project. Since I have been Administrator, we have substantially continued and increased the funding for that whole research effort. We are putting a lot more into creation of technology that is applicable in Africa.

We are looking at building local capabilities. We have increased the number of people that we are training in Africa very substantially. What I am talking about applies to other areas of the world, but it is particularly applicable here. We found in the Sahel, for example, that we simply don't have the local people who can administer the programs we have been funding. We have to do much, much more in training than we are doing.

We are building institutions, creating extension systems, and improving education systems.

And we are working hard at the whole policy context. We are saying to countries: Look, don't ask us for fertilizer when you keep your food prices below farmer's costs. No amount of fertilizer will do any good unless you provide your farmers the incentives to produce. Raise your prices, then we will talk fertilizer. We find among the governments with which we work more and more acceptance of these ideas.

Public Law 480 is an important tool in our policy dialog. I would like to congratulate this committee for the Gilman-Solarz effort and the committee's leadership in getting this important piece of legislation that really strengthened our hand with governments around the world, in getting self-help measures tied into Public Law 480 programs.[11] This committee, Mr. Chairman, has been key to very important Public Law 480 changes.

Let me talk a little bit about Ethiopia. Obviously it is a matter of major concern to members of this committee and to me. But before I talk about that particular country and the situation there, I would like to state this administration's policy concerning emergency food needs.

Our position is that we are going to respond without regard to political considerations. The hungry child knows no politics. We think we have done that. I grant this program has, and this policy has, achieved a special focus in recent times, as we have been faced with the situation in Ethiopia. But several months ago I authorized, worked and got through the interagency committee that makes the decisions, $9.2 million for Mozambique, a country we have not had close relation-

Carlucci, was formed in February 1983 to review the goals and activities of the U.S. foreign assistance program. ships with. And we did that because of the drought situation in that country.

Recently, really in some part because of Secretary Shultz's interest, there was a prompt and early set-aside of some $25 million for the drought situation in Southern Africa. In that drought area are countries like Angola in addition to Mozambique. We think that we need to respond to where the hungry people are. We think we need to be sure we can get the food there. There are often problems when we don't have good relations with a country; often the problems are more severe for our purposes of getting the food to the hungry people.

My point again, though, is that the hungry child knows no politics. We feel that we need to uphold the age-old American tradition of responding to emergency needs.

As to Ethiopia itself, so far in 1983 we have provided $8.5 million for drought relief and food assistance. $4 million has been targeted for emergency relief, of which $1.5 million has gone through an international organization. Now that figure, I might point out, Mr. Chairman, does not include any of the money provided to refugees, for example, in the Sudan, outside the borders of Ethiopia. Reports indicate I might say, that many refugees have been going to Sudan to get food—political concerns no doubt were part of that, but there has been a lot of feeding of Ethiopians outside of Ethiopia.

Very recently and after careful study, I made the decision to proceed with transportation moneys, particularly in relationship to the distribution of our food. We have been discussing this matter with Catholic Relief Services, and, in fact, the person working out how this might be done will be back from Ethiopia in New York today. And we expect within days, perhaps today, to complete the discussion as to how this is to be done.

UNDRO had asked the world, but particularly the Europeans, for transportation moneys. UNDRO, incidentally, is not an operational organization. There has been some confusion, I think, about that. UNDRO through its world-wide appeals seems to coordinate the information flow to and from donors and expects moneys to be directed through other organizations. Funds do not normally go to UNDRO emergency efforts directly.

The U.S. contribution of $700,000 will be an important part of an effort to rent vehicles in Ethiopia. We believe that such vehicles are fairly widely available. It is cheaper to rent. It avoids the problem of diversion of relief vehicles for military purposes. And we are convinced that this will help a great deal.

Now, we know that there is no need for more food in Ethiopia at the moment. There is a backup in at least one port. Food is not the problem today. We are going to have to continue to watch the situation. No doubt in the months ahead additional food will be needed. As in this case, we are going to be prepared to respond as that need evolves.

The problem today is to get that food, that emergency food, distributed.

I might say also that out of that $700,000 will come $50,000 to $100,000—we are working out just how much—for seed. There clearly is a need for seeds to be available for the next planting, inasmuch as many seeds have been eaten and are obviously not available.

One other aspect of our Ethiopian program deserves comment. About a year ago, almost a year ago, we had made the decision not to advance a number for the ongoing feeding program in Ethiopia, and to informally communicate that we thought the Ethiopians could and should do much more for themselves in light of the question about the military buildup.

It has been my position now for several weeks, that we needed to review that situation. Well, the facts are that the drought is vast and that it is affecting virtually every aspect of life in Ethiopia. And so we are now going to continue with that feeding program of approximately $3 million in commodities and $2 million in transport costs in 1984.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that that addresses the Ethiopian situation. Overall, AID is providing $8.5 million in drought relief and food aid, some $700,000 in transportation and some seeds, and now for 1984, a $5 million ongoing and emergency feeding program.

We of course would expect that in the months ahead there is going to be more food needs which we will respond to.

Mr. Chairman, in short, we have responded to all those requests which have come to us.

Thank you very much.

Statement by the Secretary of Agriculture (Block) Before the House Agriculture Committee, October 25, 1983 [12]

U.S. Efforts To Increase the World Food Supply

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Gentlemen, I am pleased to have a chance to address the committee. Along with me, I have from the State Department, Mr. Streeb on my left, and on my right, Mr. Brady and Mr. Gladson from AID. After we complete all of our statements, I think we may be, with your permission, sir, inclined to share the responsibility of providing answers for the committee.

I want to talk about, first of all, the extent of world hunger. In recent months, a severe drought in Africa has brought the issue of world hunger to the front pages of our newspapers; it has led us to reexamine the scope of the problem of hunger and its causes.

Estimates of the number of undernourished people in the world vary widely, but the Food and Agriculture Organization puts the figure at nearly 500 million.

The toll that hunger and malnutrition take in the developing world is great. One child in four dies before the age of 5, most as a result of malnutrition. Each year, 100,000 children go blind from the lack of vitamin A.

Over 82 million people are born a year, and more than 9 out of 10 are in the developing world. The heart of world food problems lies in keeping up with this population growth. By the year 2000, we must build world food output by 50 to 60 percent to feed over 6 billion people.

So far, we have kept up—we have kept up at least statistically. The average consumption of calories per person has in fact gone up since 1960. In most developing nations, the average amount of food produced per person has grown steadily since the 1950's, even though the developing world's population has almost doubled.

Yearly growth in food output by developing nations has averaged 3 percent since the 1950's. That is better than the record for most developed countries.

The overall trend in world food output is favorable. The crux of the problem is that improvements have not been uniform. We have seen some progress in Latin America and East Asia, but in recent years, per capita food production in Africa has actually dropped. Part of the long-term difficulty there stems from rapid population growth that has eroded gains in food output.

The African food crisis today is aggravated by widespread drought. Much farmland in Africa is marginal at best; there is relatively little irrigation.

Africa now has a serious emergency. Farmers in 23 countries with 225 million people face adverse conditions for production. About 9 million people face serious nutritional threats, and starvation is occurring in some regions.

This past summer, the Food and Agriculture Organization called on the developed countries to provide 600,000 tons of food aid and $60 million in assistance to these African nations. The United States has already allocated $25 million in emergency food aid under Title II of Public Law 480. [13] Roughly $12 to $13 million was used in fiscal year 1983. The remaining funds are earmarked for fiscal year 1984.

Since June the food situation has worsened. We now estimate that the 23 countries affected by drought will have fiscal year 1984 food aid needs of some 3.3 million tons in 1983–84, even after projected commercial purchases of a record 10.7 million tons. Responding to these needs will require a very heavy commitment of planned Public Law 480 reserves to the region.

The fiscal year 1984 Title I/III [14] plan already allocates $132.5 million in commodities for sub-Saharan Africa. We are constantly reviewing the situation so we can respond quickly to emergency requests.

The United States has focused on three areas in working to overcome hunger and the poverty that causes it in the developing world: one, food aid; two, helping developing nations to improve their economies; and, three, promoting sound world agricultural policies.

In regard to the first one, food aid, we have shown our concern for hungry people in the developing world by increasing our assistance. USDA works with AID to donate Government-owned dairy commodities to the needy abroad. Donations to 14 countries have already topped 83,000 tons. Last year the administration raised the pledge to the world food program by 14 percent, to $250 million, a new record.

We also continue to be the largest contributor to international organizations that work to overcome hunger, such as FAO, UNICEF, and the international development banks.

Our food-for-peace program has passed the $40 billion mark, and we continue to give more food aid than all other nations combined.

The administration has strongly supported an increase of $8.4 billion in the U.S. contribution to the International Monetary Fund to help developing nations maintain economic stability. At USDA, we have greatly accelerated the use of our own credit programs. CCC export credit guarantees and the blended credit programs were used to finance $5 billion in agricultural exports in 1983. That is one and one-half times the amount financed under CCC in 1982.

A strong U.S. commitment to food aid is essential, but it will not end hunger and malnutrition in the developing world. For one thing, problems with storage, transportation, and distribution make it hard to get food aid to those most in need. They also make it difficult for developing nations to conserve their supplies. In Africa, post-harvest losses can run as high as 60 percent. We must prevent food aid from undermining agricultural development in recipient countries and fostering dependence instead of self-reliance. Real food security and a decline in hunger rest in helping developing nations grow more food and store or distribute it better. Helping their agricultural economies will also allow them to earn enough to import more food.

It is U.S. policy to be unselfish in sharing agricultural technology with the developing world. USDA has worked with AID, FAO, and others to send over 800 technicians a year to 76 countries to carry out assistance projects. They include efforts to cut malnutrition in children in Latin America, overcome vitamin A deficiency in Indonesia, and improve development management in the Sahel.

In the research area, we work with other nations on 240 cooperative projects to curb crop losses and build food output. Last year we sent 271 scientists overseas on 124 exchanges aimed at solving world agricultural problems.

Still another way we share U.S. agricultural skill is international training. Altogether, USDA has arranged or given training to over 70,000 foreign agriculturists at the rate of over 2,000 a year. In all these efforts, USDA works closely with AID, the lead agency in development.

Now I would like to turn to agricultural policy and world hunger. In June, Mr. Chairman, I attended the World Food Council Ministerial in New York, [15] and in 2 weeks I will have the privilege of being chairman of the FAO Conference in [14] Title I of P.L. 480 authorizes the President to arrange for the sale of agricultural commodities to friendly governments in exchange for local currencies. Title III authorizes him to permit certain needy countries to use local currencies generated by P.L. 480 sales to develop their food production and distribution capabilities as part of a Food for Development Program. For the texts of Titles I and III, as amended, see 7 U.S.C. 1701 et seq. and 1727 et seq.

Rome.[16] Both the World Food Council and the FAO devote a great deal of time and effort to the discussion of world hunger and efforts to overcome it. Much of the discussion focuses on agricultural policy.

I have always felt that realistic agricultural policies, national and international, can go a long way toward solving world food problems. I raised certain policy issues with the ministers at the World Food Council meeting in New York. I will raise them again in Rome. They are: (1) national reserves; (2) incentives for farmers; (3) comparative advantage; and, (4) trade as a development tool.

With regard to national reserves, our 4-million-ton reserve of wheat and the farmers' reserves insure that the United States will keep honoring its food aid and commercial commitments. But all major nations must share the burden of maintaining world food reserves.

We have offered technical help to developing nations so they can also set up reserves.

Concerning incentives for farmers, there is no point in training, research, and technical assistance unless farmers have the incentive to produce. I have told agriculture ministers from other countries that the best food security lies in having farmers who want to produce because they can make a profit.

Developing nations need policies that make farming profitable for their agriculture, or their agriculture will never flourish. In the long run, world food security lies in having countries produce what they produce well. By that I mean what they produce economically, using their comparative advantage.

When countries cannot grow some foods economically, they should buy them. I made that point often at the World Food Council meeting. I am not in a position on my Illinois farm to grow bananas or coconuts, but I can grow corn. Agricultural development must take into account the realities of comparative advantage.

People tend to forget how much trade can help development. Freer agricultural trade could spur economic growth throughout the developing world. If the level of protectionism in agricultural trade were cut in half, developing nations could raise their exchange earnings by $8.5 billion a year. That would be a tremendous boost for their economies. Even now, these nations earn 17 times more through trade than they receive through aid. That is a very significant figure—17 times more through trade than through aid. Some development programs, like the Caribbean Basin Initiative, emphasize trade.

There are those who feel that helping agriculture in developing nations hurts U.S. producers. It is just the opposite. Developing countries are the market of the future. They already buy one-half of our industrial exports and, in fiscal year 1982, they bought $14 billion worth of U.S. farm products. Those sales helped our trade balance and created hundreds of thousands of jobs. By helping these nations build their economies, we are making sure they can be even stronger customers in the years ahead.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, we can see that food aid, trade, and development are all closely related. To overcome hunger and malnutrition, we have to work in all three areas.

We also know that the problem of world hunger is a lot more complex than we thought 10 or 20 years ago. We still have a lot to learn about the best ways to attack it. But I assure you, we are dedicated to finding a solution.

I would be glad to answer your questions.

Transcript of a Press Briefing by the Secretary of State (Shultz), May 20, 1983 (Extract) [1]

U.S. Objectives at Williamsburg

Q. What do you expect to accomplish at Williamsburg and how?

SECRETARY SHULTZ: I think, there are many important things to get to happen in the world, and which by and large will happen if the right policies are followed by individual countries. And I hope that Williamsburg can make a contribution to that.

Of course, the main thing is economic growth in the world economy. That's the name of the game in my opinion. Well, that depends on the United States in considerable part, Germany, Japan, United Kingdom, others, developing countries. So from the standpoint of the U.S. economy, I think you could only describe our fiscal and monetary policy right now as very expansionary, very strongly pushing that.

So, I think we're doing what we should be doing. Other countries we'll learn about as we go, but I think Japan and Germany are looking pretty good right now, and perhaps the same for the United Kingdom.

I think that it's impressive when you look at where growth has come in the last 8 or 10 years in the world, to see how much has been contributed by the so-called Third World or developing countries. And we need to rearrange our thinking in this country and perhaps elsewhere away from the notion that somehow those are poor economies and we should help them. I'm not saying that they aren't poor and that they shouldn't be helped, but rather, we have to get our thinking geared more to the notion that they are economies that have a big capacity for growth, and when they grow that is fundamentally good for us, and so we have a stake in them and there are certain things that follow from that, I think, in terms of our own policies, and we need to be willing to step up to those things and encourage our friends at the Summit to do likewise.

I think the issue of trade and protectionism is very important, and it's extremely serious. It's important because if there is expansion in these different economies, it's the fact of trade among them that allows a kind of mutually stimulative effect to take place, so that everything can go forward together around in the world economy.

I say it is a very serious problem only in part because of particular moves individual countries are making in the protectionist field. I think that's the least of the problem at the moment. And, in fact, in the case of Japan, things have gotten better, not worse. In the case of some other countries, including ourselves, I think we've made some courageous decisions. But we've had a little slippage here and there. I think the big threat is, in a sense, an intellectual one.

There is an effort now under way emerging since the effort to make protection—make it legitimate and fashionable even, to talk about running a protectionist economy, that somehow it's our duty. And I think it is linked to a considerable extent, in this country, anyway, to so-called industrial policy. And that looms as a big sort of intellectual debate. But I put great store on the question of what is, in a sense, legitimate. And once an idea like the value of open trading to us takes hold and people accept that as right, well, it has big consequences. Because when moves away from it are made they get criticized and that upholds a standard to which you repair all the time. If the standard is disturbed and some other standard is created, you don't have it to repair to, and you will I think, degenerate badly.

So I think it's very important and worthwhile, not empty at all, that in forums like this the affirmation of the importance of open trade is made. The reason why I thought the OECD ministerial meeting was quite positive, because there was a distinct shift in tone there from the GATT ministerial on this critical issue that involves, in a sense, the intellectual standing of the idea of open trade.

Statement by Robert D. Hormats Before the Joint Economic Committee, May 24, 1983 [2]

The Benefits and Risks of Economic Summit Conferences

Thank you, Mr. Vice Chairman. I appreciate the opportunity to testify before this committee again on a familiar subject that we've covered several times before on earlier summits and I'd like to start out by sharing with this committee some thoughts on what summits can reasonably be expected to do and to reasonably be expected not to do—the benefits and risks of summits—to put them in perspective. We've had eight summits now and I think we have learned something from each of them.

What summits have been able to contribute over the last several years fall into several categories. First, summits have demonstrated their ability to espouse broad principles such as avoidance of protectionist measures. While these have not been foolproof, I think they have at least helped to avoid mutually destructive actions by governments, not entirely but to a degree.

Second, they've been able to develop certain objectives which governments have worked toward with a sense of mutual purpose; that is, such institutions as the World Bank and increasing support for the GATT trade negotiations in the Tokyo round. [3]

The third area is that they have been able, under certain circumstances, to reach agreement on specific targets which can be monitored; for instance, the targets to reduce energy imports which were useful devices during the midst of the energy crisis in the latter part of the 1970's.

Fourth, they've been able to agree on studies which have shed more light on world issues and have helped leaders to resolve these issues subsequently with a greater degree of information and with less politicization of the problem.

Two examples that I would mention are the international nuclear fuel cycle evaluation—which was helpful in resolving an important conflict between the United States and Europe several years ago, and the Versailles study on exchange rates has shed additional light on that difficult and still very sensitive issue.

Summits also enable leaders to learn better one another's objectives, motivations, and interests, which is useful in helping individual leaders to plot their own priorities. They also enable leaders to develop their priorities within their own countries and collectively. That is to say, frequently leaders before summits get recommendations from virtually every agency of government, and leaders, when they get to the summit, have to determine what their priorities are, what the national priorities are among all these competing domestic priorities, and develop a certain sense of mutual or common priorities so that they can achieve certain agreed results at the summits.

Summits also make it more difficult for leaders to take actions which do violence to, or which are negative in terms of, the international economy, knowing that they have every year to go back to the summit and to account to a degree to their peers for the actions they've taken. Now this is clearly not a foolproof process but it does create a certain additional consideration that leaders have to take into account when they shape policy.

[2] Source: Williamsburg Economic Summit: Hearing Before the Joint Economic Committee, Congress of the United States, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), pp. 24–27. Vice Chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, Lee H. Hamilton, presided over the hearing in the absence of the chairman, Senator Roger W. Jepsen. Hormats, a Vice President at Goldman, Sachs, & Co., served as Assistant Secretary of State for Economic and Business Affairs from May 21, 1981, to August 25, 1982.

[3] See footnote 31 to document 60.

There are, however, a number of risks, and we've seen those risks manifested rather clearly in the Versailles summit. The major risk, it seems to me, is that leaders attempt to use the summits to achieve too much. That is to say, they attempt to try to reconcile differences which are so deep or so deeply embedded in the political philosophies and national policies of various participants that raising them and pushing them very hard simply leads to friction. Another element of that is that, when they can't reach an agreement on substance, there tends to be an attempt to try to reach agreement on words in the communiqué. That leads to the sort of blowoff that we had after Versailles.

The leaders going into this summit have recognized these two problems. There is a genuine attempt, and I believe a very constructive attempt, to downplay still major differences on East–West issues. There is also, in my judgment, a very healthy attempt to downplay the communiqué which is to say not focus so much on words and focus more on substance.

There is, however, a risk in all this. The risk is that in attempting to bend over backward to prevent an excessively ambitious approach or trying to resolve differences that can't be resolved, leaders will make the other mistake of trying to do too little. And my concern about the lack of focus of the preparations of the summit and what I expect will be, from what all I hear, the relatively unfocused discussion could lead to, first of all, ambiguity in terms of results. That is to say, leaders come out of the summit thinking that different things were agreed to or each having his own or her own individual interpretation of what was agreed to; and second, a missed opportunity to forge agreements and to articulate those agreements in such a way that there can be followup by ministers and officials in a mutually supportive way.

And my worry about Williamsburg is that, in an attempt to avoid the mistakes of Versailles—an appropriate attempt to avoid the mistakes of Versailles—it will simply not provide the leadership, not provide the sense of purpose, the sense of direction which I believe people are looking for at that summit.

I won't go over all the points of substance because previous speakers have discussed those. I must say I find myself very much in agreement with the sorts of priorities that Bill Miller outlined for the summit.[4] In particular the question of the U.S. deficit is going to be on everyone's mind because it does have an effect on interest rates, on the rate of growth in the American economy, on the pressures in this country for protectionism. Many of those pressures stem from an overvalued dollar which has reduced the competitiveness of a lot of American industry and agriculture. Much depends on what happens to the U.S. budget deficit, but that's not the only thing.

One can't simply say—and I think that Bill has indicated that as well—that that's the only issue. There are a lot of others, and he pointed them out very well.

It strikes me that we are caught today in what one might call a triangle of international economic instability. You have three sides to the triangle. One, slow growth and high unemployment; the second side is debt-related constraints on growth in the Third World; and the third side is pressure on the trading system. And it strikes me that if Williamsburg has a historic purpose, it is to try to develop a strategy for dealing with these interrelated problems.

Now there are no miracles. There are no panaceas, and Williamsburg is certainly not going to be a panacea, but it can help by developing a strategy to avoid the sort of defensive ad hoc approach which has been taken on a number of these issues so far.

It seems to me that first they can agree on a set of mutually reinforceable economic measures. Included among those is an attempt by the United States to reduce its deficit, which would help other countries to in turn relax their own monetary policy. And it strikes me that even if you take a lot of these measures, even if the measures are modest, they further will broaden and I think strengthen the recovery.

Second, the summit is going to have to address the problem of unemployment because even if there is a recovery, unemployment is still going to be a major problem in the industrialized democracies.

[4] G. William Miller, former Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and Secretary of the Treasury, testified before the Joint Economic Committee earlier in the day. His statement is printed on pp. 2–5 of the hearing.

Much of it is structural. A lot of it in the United States is youth unemployment, but there is also a growing number of people in their middle years, 40 to 55, who find themselves displaced by technological change and by reduction in capacity in traditional industries. The summit, again, is not going to come up with miracles, but it must, in my judgment, focus on that issue and try to establish a process, which I've discussed in greater detail in my written testimony, to deal with this issue.

Debt problems I think must be addressed, as Bill indicated, and it strikes me that several things need to be done. One, to press for prompt implementation and ratification of IMF quotas that were agreed to and an increase in the GAB, support for increased structural assistance, including a speedup of World Bank lending to help countries to adjust.

Also needed are longer term and lower cost rescheduling agreements so that countries can have adequate breathing space to help strengthen their economies, and sustained commercial bank lending.

I also think that summit leaders themselves should make an attempt to strengthen public understanding of the need to increase development assistance, particularly assistance to the poorer countries.

I would simply make one general statement. That is, prolonged austerity in developing countries is not the same as prolonged austerity in the developed countries. My worry is that if this situation continues, the difficult straits these countries find themselves in today are going to lead to increased social pressure and political pressures on them which may weaken the very government in the stabilization plans.

With respect to the medium term, it strikes me the summit should welcome the decision of a couple of weeks ago, to expand the Group of Ten [5] and to use it for closer and more systematic consultation among trade and finance officials to avoid trade impediments which worsen the financial situation.

I think the Group of Ten could also be given a mandate to look at exchange rate instability and misalinements which distort trade and investment. I discuss this more in my prepared statement [6] so I won't go into it now in detail.

I also think that they should use this summit as an attempt to establish an additional momentum—or shall we say regain the momentum—toward improving the trading system. That is to say, avoiding new barriers and new subsidies and making a genuine attempt to take the initiative to reduce those which currently exist and to get the rules of the trading system improved.

These are the general points I wanted to cover in summary and I'd be glad to answer any questions.

Joint Statement by the Summit Participants, Read by the Secretary of State (Shultz), Williamsburg, May 29, 1983 [7]

A Shared Commitment on Security Issues

Last night, over dinner, the Heads of State discussed security issues and judged them to be of such importance as to want to make a statement on the subject at this conference. And so a statement was developed and I will read it.

[5] Reference is to the decision of the Group of Ten at their January 18, 1983, meeting in Paris to increase their credit commitments from SDR 6.4 billion to SDR 17 billion ($7.1 billion to $19 billion) and to invite Switzerland to become a full scale participant in the General Arrangements to Borrow (GAB). These and other changes were ratified on December 26, 1983, after all ten participants had notified the International Monetary Fund of their concurrence in writing.

[6] For text of Hormats' prepared statement, see Williamsburg Economic Summit, pp. 28–47.

[7] Source: Department of State Press Release 203, June 9, 1983; printed also in Department of State Bulletin, July 1983, pp. 4–5. Participants at the Williamsburg Economic Summit Conference, May 28–30, 1983, were President Reagan, Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau of Canada, President François Mitterrand of France, Chancellor Helmut Kohl of the Federal Republic of Germany, Prime Minister Amintore Fanfani of Italy, Prime Minister Yasuhiro Nakasone of Japan, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher of the United Kingdom, and President Gaston Thorn of the European Communities Commission.

"As leaders of our seven countries, it is our first duty to defend the freedom and justice on which our democracies are based. To this end, we shall maintain sufficient military strength to deter any attack, to counter any threat, and to ensure the peace. Our arms will never be used except in response to aggression.

"We wish to achieve lower levels of arms through serious arms control negotiations. With this statement, we reaffirm our dedication to the search for peace and meaningful arms reductions. We are ready to work with the Soviet Union to this purpose and call upon the Soviet Union to work with us.

"Effective arms control agreements must be based on the principle of equality and must be verifiable. Proposals have been put forward from the Western side to achieve positive results in various international negotiations—on strategic weapons, the START talks; on intermediate-range nuclear missiles, the INF talks; on chemical weapons, on reduction of forces in Central Europe, the MBFR talks; and a conference on disarmament in Europe.

"We believe that we must continue to pursue these negotiations with impetus and urgency. In the area of INF in particular, we call upon the Soviet Union to contribute constructively to the success of the negotiations. Attempts to divide the West by proposing inclusion of the deterrent forces of third countries such as those of France and the United Kingdom will fail. Consideration of these systems has no place in the INF negotiations.

"Our nations express the strong wish that a balanced INF agreement be reached shortly. Should this occur, the negotiations will determine the level of deployment. It is well known that should this not occur, the countries concerned will proceed with the planned deployment of the U.S. systems in Europe beginning at the end of 1983.

"Our nations are united in efforts for arms reductions and will continue to carry out thorough and intensive consultations. The security of our countries is indivisible and must be approached on a global basis. Attempts to avoid serious negotiation by seeking to influence public opinion in our countries will fail.

"We commit ourselves to devote our full political resources to reducing the threat of a war. We have a vision of a world in which the shadow of war has been lifted from all mankind, and we are determined to pursue that vision."

Most of the time today in the meetings of the Heads of State was spent in discussion of economic issues, and there will be a joint statement available tomorrow at the conclusion of the conference. In the meantime, I can make a brief comment about the nature of some of the discussion.

Confidence was expressed in a spirit of realistic optimism that recovery is getting under way. Evidence of the recovery is clear. There was also discussion of the many problems that beset us—unemployment, high interest rates, high budget deficits in some countries—all of these things are matters of concern as is the protectionist pressure that we see in many countries.

The discussion in some ways can be summed up by noting the links that were talked about: The link between sustained domestic growth and the open trading system, the link between convergence of domestic policies toward noninflationary sustainable growth and greater exchange rate stability, the link between open markets and the availability of finance, the link between international economic cooperation and world progress, and the link between the developed and the developing countries and the importance of expansion in our economic activity and trade between the developed and the developing countries. Thank you.

Joint Statement by the Summit Participants, Read by President Reagan, Williamsburg, May 30, 1983 [8]

Williamsburg Declaration on Economic Recovery

It is my duty and pleasure to read the Williamsburg Declaration on Economic Recovery.

"Our nations are united in their dedication to democracy, individual freedom, creativity, moral purpose, human dignity and personal and cultural development. It is to preserve, sustain and extend these shared values that our prosperity is important.

"The recession has put our societies through a severe test; but they have proven resilient. Significant success has been achieved in reducing inflation and interest rates. There have been improvements in productivity and we now clearly can see signs of recovery.

"Nevertheless, the industrialized democracies continue to face the challenge of ensuring that the recovery materializes and endures in order to reverse a decade of cumulative inflation and reduce unemployment.

"We must all focus on achieving and maintaining low inflation and reducing interest rates from their present too high levels. We renew our commitment to reduce structural budget deficits, in particular by limiting the growth of expenditures. We recognize that we must act together and that we must pursue a balanced set of policies that take into account and exploit relationships between growth, trade and finance in order that recovery may spread to all countries, developed and developing alike.

"In pursuance of these objectives, we have agreed as follows: One, our governments will pursue appropriate monetary and budgetary policies that will be conducive to low inflation, reduced interest rates, higher productive investment and greater employment opportunities, particularly for the young.

"Two, the consultation process initiated at Versailles will be enhanced to promote convergence of economic performance in our economies and greater stability of exchange rates on the lines indicated in an Annex to this Declaration.

"We agree to pursue closer consultations on policies effecting exchange markets and on market conditions. While retaining our freedom to operate independently, we are willing to undertake coordinated intervention in exchange markets while retaining our freedom to operate independently. We are willing to undertake coordinated intervention in exchange markets in instances where it is agreed that such intervention would be helpful. "[Three], we commit ourselves to halt protectionism and, as recovery proceeds, to reverse it by dismantling trade barriers. We intend to consult within appropriate existing fora on ways to implement and monitor this commitment. We shall give impetus—missed me—(laughter)—to resolving current trade problems. We will actively pursue the current work programs in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, which is known as GATT, an organization for economic cooperation and development, including trade in services and in high technology products.

"We should work to achieve further trade liberalization negotiations in the GATT with particular emphasis on expanding trade with and among developing countries. We have agreed to continue consultations on proposals for a new negotiating round in the GATT.

"Four, we view with concern the international financial situation and especially the debt burdens of many developing nations. We agreed to a strategy based on effective adjustment and development policies by debtor nations, adequate private and official financing, more open markets, and worldwide economic recovery. We will seek ratification of the increases in resources for the International Monetary Fund and the General Arrangements to Borrow. We encourage closer cooperation and timely sharing of information among countries and the international institutions in particular, between the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, known as IBRD, and the GATT.

"Five, we have invited Ministers of Finance in consultation with the Managing Director of the IMF to define the conditions for improving the international monetary system, and to consider the part which might, in due course, be played in this process by a high-level, international monetary conference.

"Six, the weight of the recession has fallen very heavily on developing countries. And we are deeply concerned about their recovery. Restoring sound economic growth while keeping our markets open is crucial. Special attention will be given to the flow of resources, in particular, official development assistance to poorer countries and for food and energy production, both bilaterally and through appropriate international institutions. We reaffirm our commitments to provide agreed funding levels for the International Development Agency. We welcome the openness to dialogue, which the developing countries evinced at the recent Conference of the Nonaligned Movement in New Delhi and the Group of 77 in Buenos Aires. And we share their commitment to engage with understanding and cooperation in the forthcoming meeting of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development in Belgrade.

"Seven, we are agreed upon the need to encourage both the development of advanced technology and the public acceptance of its role in promoting growth, employment, and trade. We have noted with approval the report of the Working Group on Technology, Growth, and Employment which was set up at Versailles last year, and commend the progress made in the 18 cooperative projects discussed in that report. We will follow the implementation and coordination of work on these projects and look forward to receiving a further report at our next meeting.

"Eight, we all share the view that more predictability and less volatility in oil prices would be helpful to world economic prospects. We agreed that the fall in oil prices in no way diminishes the importance and urgency of efforts to conserve energy, to develop economic alternative energy sources, to maintain and, where possible, improve contacts between oil-exporting and importing countries and to encourage the growth of indigenous energy production in developing countries which at present lack it.

"[Nine,] East-West economic relations should be compatible with our security interests. We take note with approval of the work of the multilateral organizations which have in recent months analyzed and drawn conclusions regarding the key aspects of East-West economic relations. We encourage continuing work by these organizations as appropriate.

"Ten, we have agreed to strengthen cooperation in protection of the environment in better use of natural resources and in health research. Our discussions here at Williamsburg give us new confidence in the prospects for a recovery. We have strengthened our resolve to deal cooperatively with continuing problems so as to promote a sound and sustainable recovery, bringing new jobs and a better life for the people of our own countries and of the world.

"We have agreed to meet again next year and have accepted the British Prime Minister's invitation to meet in the United Kingdom."

It has been inspiring to meet with the leaders of the seven major industrial nations in this beautifully restored village of the past. Here we have tried to shape the positive and common approach to our economic future. These democracies feel special responses for—or responsible for the world economy and for the democratic values we all share.

And, so, we came together determined to do something about some of the world's toughest problems. Our meeting has shown a spirit of confidence, optimism and certainty—confidence that recovery is underway, optimism that it will be durable and certainty that economic policy and security ties among us will be strengthened in the future.

The United States has been privileged to host this meeting from which a message of hope can be sent to the people of the world and to future generations. Together the summit partners are facing today's enormous challenges head on and not settling for quick fixes. We are the guardians of fundamental democratic values, the values that have always united us.

We will only be satisfied when we have restored durable economic growth that offers our people an opportunity for the better future that they deserve.

The meeting will conclude with tonight's dinner and may I just add a heartfelt thank you to the wonderful people of Williamsburg who have been so warm in their greeting to us, so gracious and so kind, and that have made this, in addition to a hard-working session, a distinct pleasure. And I think I speak for all of us in saying this. Thank you all. (Applause)

Annex to the Williamsburg Declaration on Economic Recovery [9]

Strengthening Economic Cooperation for Growth and Stability

I. We have examined in the light of our experience the procedures outlined in the undertakings agreed at Versailles last year which seek to ensure greater monetary stability in the interest of balanced growth and progress of the world economy.

II. We reaffirm the objectives of achieving non-inflationary growth of income and employment, and promoting exchange market stability through policies designed to bring about greater convergence of economic performance in this direction.

III. We are reinforcing our multilateral cooperation with the International Monetary Fund in its surveillance activities, according to the procedures agreed at Versailles, through the following approach:

A. We are focusing on near-term policy actions leading to convergence of economic conditions in the medium term. The overall medium-term perspective remains essential, both to ensure that short-term policy innovations do not lead to divergence and to reassure business and financial markets.

B. In accordance with the agreement reached at Versailles, we are focusing our attention on issues in the monetary and financial fields including interaction with policies in other areas. We shall take fully into account the international implications of our own policy decisions. Policies and objectives that will be kept under review include:

(1) Monetary Policy. Disciplined non-inflationary growth of monetary aggregates, and appropriate interest rates, to avoid subsequent resurgence of inflation and rebound in interest rates, thus allowing room for sustainable growth.

(2) Fiscal Policy. We will aim, preferably through discipline over government expenditures, to reduce structural budget deficits and bear in mind the consequences of fiscal policy for interest rates and growth.

(3) Exchange Rate Policy. We will improve consultations, policy convergence and international cooperation to help stabilize exchange markets, bearing in mind our conclusions on the Exchange Market Intervention Study.

(4) Policies Toward Productivity and Employment. While relying on market signals as a guide to efficient economic decisions, we will take measures to improve training and mobility of our labor forces, with particular concern for the problems of youth unemployment, and promote continued structural adjustment, especially by:

—Enhancing flexibility and openness of economies and financial markets.

—Encouraging research and development as well as profitability and productive investment.

—Continued efforts in each country, and improved international cooperation, where appropriate, on structural adjustment measures (e.g., regional, sectoral, energy policies).

IV. We shall continue to assess together regularly in this framework the progress we are making, consider any corrective

Transcript of a Press Briefing by the Secretary of State (Shultz), Williamsburg, May 30, 1983 (Extract) [10]

The Impact of the Williamsburg Security Statement on U.S.-Soviet Arms Negotiations

. . . . . .

Q. Mr. Secretary, Tass has answered the statement that was issued yesterday saying that this whole conference obliterates detente in full. Do you have a response to their response?

Q. Question.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I was informed that Tass had a statement today—I hadn't seen it—saying that the statement issued yesterday "obliterates detente in full." I'm quoting you. I don't know whether—I assume I'm quoting Tass. Trust you. (Laughter)

Well, this is just a piece of information that you've given me and I haven't had a chance to really look at it and see what else they may have said or anything of that kind.

But I would say that in the statement [11] there is strength, there is purposefulness, there is unity, there is a sense of cohesion. And there also is expressed in several places in the statement a complete willingness to sit down and try to negotiate outstanding problems with the Soviet Union.

Now, we don't consider it a negotiation if they say the way, for instance, in INF is for them to have a monopoly of intermediate-range missiles. That doesn't look like a sensible outcome for us. So we say that. But that's only being reasonable and strong and sensible.

Q. To follow up. Where do you think—What is the state of détente in your opinion right now?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, it's a word that has a great many meanings. I would say that the United States and the Alliance is strong, the United States and the Alliance is realistic about what is taking place around the world in many dimensions, the Western relationship with the Soviet Union and the United States. And the Alliance has expressed on many occasions a readiness to sit down and talk about outstanding problems in a spirit of trying to solve them. So I don't know what you call that. I'd call it a pretty sensible stance for us, frankly.

Q. Mr. Secretary, the President has said again that he thinks the Russians won't negotiate on TNF until they're convinced that we are going to move forward in absolute agreement with the placement of missiles. And so he said that we are going to move forward.

My question really is what's your hunch? Do you think the Russians at some point before next December will become convinced that we're serious and serious to negotiate or will it take an actual installation of cruise and even Pershing missiles to convince them?

SECRETARY SHULTZ: Well, the thing that we and our Allies have control over is what we do and what stance we have. So what the statement basically says is that—I hate to keep repeating myself—that we're strong and we're determined and absent an agreement, there'll be deployment. And if there is an agreement at some level other than zero, then the—whatever the agreement says will determine the level of deployment. I don't know that I'm quoting it exactly accurately; but that's the basic notion.

Now, that's what we have. And we can say this is going to be our pattern of behavior and put that forward and also say we're ready to negotiate.

Now, the question of whether there is an agreement or not will depend on how they react to the situation and that remains to be seen.

[10] Source: White House Press Release, May 30, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the President; printed also in Department of State Bulletin, July 1983, pp. 15–17. The Secretary of State conducted the briefing at 3:34 p.m.

[11] See document 78.

Q. And you haven't an inkling as to whether they're going to become convinced before December or have to actually see those missiles go in place?

SECRETARY SHULTZ: Well, you always—in any negotiation, you scratch your head and you look at your opposite side and you speculate about their situation. And, of course, we do that. And I think it only stands to reason that if they think they can get their objective without giving up anything themselves, well, they'll be delighted. But they should be convinced by now that they can't do that because there is a determined alliance here.

Now, how far along toward deployment dates we have to get or whether we have to actually deploy, I don't know what it takes to convince them of that fact. But by this time, I should think they'd be convinced because there's a very determined attitude.

The Nature of the Summit Discussions

Q. Mr. President, you had said before this summit that you wanted it structured in this way because you'd have a frank discussion with other leaders.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. Did you learn anything from that? Did your views change in any way because of what was said to you here in that format?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, actually, not in any major way because you would be amazed at how much our thinking was alike on so many of the things discussed.

But in connection with the question also on structure, the difference was that I've been—the summits that I've been to before, each head of state would make a statement and that would be it then. Whether they agreed, disagreed or not, they had made their statement.

The difference was here, you'd open up a subject—let us say that the subject had to do with trade, we'd open up the subject and everyone could express their views and so forth and then we kept going and discussing to see what we could all agree on as a consensus of what we would do with this in—in the area of this subject—that would further benefit, not only us, but the world.

Q. Do you feel that you persuaded anybody to some view that they didn't have before they came here?

THE PRESIDENT. Not really. The whole idea of convergence—that—the answer is that you can't have one nation recover without the others, that this is a world recession, that what we do effects each other and that, therefore, we must have more surveillance, more constant communication, particularly at our ministerial level, on the progress that we're all making. And this included the developing countries also, that they cannot be out here on the other side of a door that their good economic situation, their prosperity is vital to us as ours is to them. And as I say, there was great agreement on this. But what then did happen was you had the thoughts of others that contributed to come into a consensus as to how we were going to go about this, what we were going to do. And remember that the idea of the subjects wasn't just chaos of anyone coming with what they thought. A lot of this was based on the fact that at the ministerial level, OECD, and the NATO Summit, in the discussions on the international monetary funds and all, we were well prepared in advance of knowing what was on the minds of each other.

Q. Mr. President, if I may, this was a summit designed so that those of you who met privately could, on several occasions, could have a frank exchange, candid exchange of views—candid, personal. And yet you're saying that there were diverse views in here. And yet you're saying in spite of all of that, nobody's views changed very much—

THE PRESIDENT. In that—as I interpreted the question there, was there any sudden situation where you had just diametrically opposed ideas as say a way to bring about prosperity. No, everyone recognized that—for example in our own problems of deficits and interest rates and the bad effect that they have had on the economy. There was general agreement on all of these things. And then the thing was how, for example—it's in that statement that came out, differing than some conferences where the statement was written in advance and before you'd had the discussions. That statement was the result of the discussions.

Q. Let me give you a for instance. You said in your personal addendum to the statement that the world now recognizes there should be no quick fixes which as you mentioned—

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. —in the United States. But I know you were told by some of the leaders in there that despite—the best expected performance of the economy, unemployment is going to remain high for some time to come, recession may even deepen in some countries, and there are people who are concerned about the political and social upheaval that this can cause and, therefore, might favor some kind of quick fix, at least to avert the kind of crisis the United States faces. Did that discussion not temper your views about at least some quick fixes—

THE PRESIDENT. No, as a matter of fact, one of the participants referred to quick fixes as "quack medicine" and that we've proven by experience they don't work. They only worsen the situation. So—and there is great willingness on the part of all of them, that they realized that they had to face up to some social changes in order to get control of excessive spending. And, as I say, the document attests that—the statement to the outcome. We didn't leave any subject up in the air and say, well, you know, we're differing on this. Let's move on to something else. No. We stayed until we'd worked out what we all felt was a way to go on the particular subject. And there was no vote taken. There were no winners or losers. There wasn't any case in which five said, well—to two, you're out-voted and this is what we're going to say. No. Before we settled on it, all seven were in agreement.

Q. Mr. President, your administration wasn't—it's well known that your administration wasn't enthusiastic about an international conference—monetary conference. Did you modify your views during the summit?

THE PRESIDENT. The funny thing was in the conversations, it isn't so much a modifying of views as it is a learning of what the views really were. For example, the principal proponent of such a conference opened by making it plain that he had not meant in any way that we go back 40 years and follow a pattern of something that was adopted 40 years ago—the world has changed—but that it was something to be looked at. Well, we ourselves had come with the idea that just as out of the Versailles summit—and while many people have been quick to say that nothing good came out of that, a lot did. We have had since the Versailles summit a relationship at the ministerial level on several subjects that has been ongoing and that has made great progress with regard to trade, the East-West situation, the—all of these things.

And so the idea that these same ministers will now, as they go forward in this surveillance—mutual surveillance to make sure that we're not getting off the track in some country or other that might set back for all of us the recovery, that this they will look at very closely and see if such a conference would be a help in what we're trying to do. Now, it's going to depend on what they all decide and what they recommend.

Address by President Reagan, Camp David, Maryland, June 4, 1983 (Extract) [13]

. . . . . .

Now, a few words about our deliberations at the economic summit at Williamsburg. I was very pleased that the leaders of the great democracies could meet in that beautiful, colonial city so rich in history and culture. It was a perfect place to renew ties and pledge our best efforts to achieve stronger prosperity and security by living up to those cherished values that bind us: democracy, individual freedom, moral purpose, human dignity, and personal development.

Perhaps you're thinking, "That sounds fine. But how does it affect me?" Well, Williamsburg was meaningful and constructive in several ways. The leaders of the seven, free industrialized nations met in a private, informal setting—one that encouraged some of the best talks among the Allies in recent years. We were determined, as sincere and well-intentioned individuals, to talk through our problems, to rise above bickering and discord so, together, we could forge a common strategy for growth and jobs to ensure the better future our people deserve.

I think we succeeded. Our meetings produced a shared spirit of confidence, optimism, and cooperation—confidence that an economic recovery is beginning, optimism that it can spread to all countries and that it will last if our countries cooperate to keep inflation down, reduce interest rates further, and put a stop to protectionism.

Williamsburg also demonstrated, to the chagrin of the Soviets, that the spirit of unity in the West for peace through strength is alive and well. Every Western leader who attended agreed that we must resist Soviet efforts to drive a wedge between us. And we all committed ourselves to maintain our security while seeking real arms reductions and working for the cause of peace.

The Williamsburg summit was a positive gain that sent a message of hope to the world. That makes it all the more important for each country to follow up with sound, common sense policies that carry us forward toward greater progress.

Statement by the Representative to the International Atomic Energy Agency (Kennedy) Before the IAEA Board of Governors, Vienna, February 22, 1983 [1]

"The United States . . . Is Prepared To Renew Its Commitment to the IAEA and Its Important Programs"

I wish to advise the board of certain decisions recently taken by my government. As you all are aware, last September the United States suspended its participation in the IAEA. [2] Since that time, my government has been engaged in an extensive review and assessment of the IAEA and the future role of the United States in this agency. I would like to use this opportunity to share with you briefly some of the conclusions which we have reached from our intensive study, which is now completed.

Let me begin by recalling for the governors the message President Reagan sent to the delegates on the occasion of the 26th general conference. At that time the President said:

> "The United States is determined to work with other countries to assure that this agency can successfully meet the challenges ahead—from strengthening technical cooperation for sharing the benefits of nuclear energy to finding ways of improving further the technical and institutional safeguards against its misuse. It is our profound hope that others will share this determination—for it would be a tragedy for succeeding generations if we permit this organization to be weakened or undermined by political issues and concerns, which, however strong the emotions they arouse, are extraneous to the central technical purposes for which the agency was founded." [3]

It was with these thoughts in mind that our assessment was conducted. Our assessment underscored two basic points.

First, it is overwhelmingly clear that the IAEA has played and should continue to play a critical role in support of very substantial interests of all of its member states. The IAEA has contributed in a major way to progress in the expanded and safe use of nuclear-generated electric power and through its other development programs such as those in medicine, industry, agriculture, health, and safety. At the same time, we are all beneficiaries of the assurance provided through the application of international safeguards that nuclear material is not being misused for illicit and destructive purposes. Perpetuation of this assurance is essential if progress in peaceful nuclear development is to continue.

We, therefore, need to work together to improve the effectiveness of IAEA technical assistance programs, to improve the agency's safeguard system, and to maintain an effective secretariat. The director general is aware of the concerns we have expressed, and I am confident that we can achieve these needed improvements if we all exert our best efforts to that end.

The second major point emerging from our assessment is that, just as we are all the beneficiaries of the work conducted by the IAEA, we will all pay a considerable price if the viability and effectiveness of the IAEA are threatened. Yet it is clear to us that the growing trend toward controversy and divisiveness over political issues extraneous to the work of the IAEA is such a direct threat. We believe that unless this tendency is promptly checked, it will render the IAEA ineffective and will fatally corrode the enthusiasm with which member states have participated here for the last 25 years.

[2] For text of the statement issued by the Department of State upon suspension of U.S. participation in the International Atomic Energy Agency, see American Foreign Policy: Current Documents, 1982, p. 324.

[3] President Reagan's message was incorporated into the speech made by the head of the U.S. delegation to the 26th IAEA General Conference, Deputy Secretary of Energy W. Kenneth Davis, on September 21, 1982.

This is not to say that there will not continue to be legitimate differences among us regarding the allocation of agency resources and the relative emphasis placed on its programs. There are, of course, legitimate differences in perspectives and interests among the member states of the agency. We must not, however, abandon debate of issues germane to the IAEA in favor of debate of controversial political issues which should be addressed elsewhere. To do that would be to abandon our mutual and important interests in the IAEA.

In short, the agency must respect the statute and not, for reasons of political expediency, act in ways that are inconsistent with that statute. The agency's role in promoting the peaceful uses of nuclear energy during this critical period depends entirely on the credibility of its technical expertise.

As members of the IAEA's governing body, we bear a singular responsibility for determining the agency's future course. I believe we should make a determined effort to reestablish the tradition of member state cooperation which characterized its first 25 years. I look forward to working actively toward this end with you.

My government and, we are confident, other concerned governments will be watching carefully to see which direction the agency pursues in the months ahead. We hope and trust that the agency can put behind it the unfortunate political wrangling of the recent past and get back to the basic purposes which brought us all together in the first place.

The United States for its part then is prepared to renew its commitment to the IAEA and its important programs. Within the constraint of U.S. law, the United States intends to support fully these programs. At the same time, I must note that our commitment must depend on the degree to which other members are also determined to return this agency to its status as an effective international technical organization. It is our deep desire that all member states will join with us in this sincere effort. Together we can strengthen this unique international organization and see that the agency lives up to the principles contained in its statute.

Five Priorities for U.S. Policy in the United Nations and Other International Organizations

I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you to present the President's fiscal year 1984 request for contributions to the certain voluntary funded organizations and programs of the United Nations and the Organization of American States. I will restrict my remarks primarily to the United Nations. Ambassador Middendorf is here to respond to any questions which you may have dealing with OAS programs. [5]

In addressing the authorization request now before the committee, it might be useful to place the request in context by describing my basic approach to the United Nations and the Bureau of International Organization Affairs.

As this committee may recall, I took office last June 4, and on June 9 announced five policy priorities to guide the work of the Bureau. [6] We have incorporated these priorities into our day-to-day management of multilateral issues, and we have used them to maintain a steady focus on those matters of greatest importance to the United States.

The first priority is that of a reassertion of America's leadership role in international organizations. In the last General Assembly, for example, we turned back Cuba's effort to put Puerto Rico on the Assembly's agenda. We were instrumental in defeating an attempt to exclude Israel from full participation. [7] Both were difficult situations in which we took an aggressive stance and prevailed.

Our second priority deals with budget responsibility. The United States is dedicated to supporting international organizations whose assessed budgets reflect conservative fiscal policies and economic reality. The President's own budget policy of zero net program growth and significant absorption of nondiscretionary cost increases is certainly reflected in this policy.

In view of the restraint being imposed on the domestic programs of the United States and other major contributors, international organizations simply cannot be immune from economic reality. Although the battle is far from won, we are seeing some encouraging signs here, such as the defeat of the unwarranted pay raise for U.N. employees at our insistence, [8] and slower budget growth is finally starting to gain some support.

The third priority is strengthening U.S. influence in international conferences. Leaner delegations not only contribute to cost savings, but they also assure us of more disciplined delegations. Our goal here is to reduce the delegations by 30 percent as compared to fiscal year 1980. Over the last 8 months, we have achieved a reduction of more than 26 percent.

Our fourth priority is more U.S. nationals serving in international organizations. We want, of course, no unfair advantage here, but we do seek to fall within the established ranges in each one of these organizations. We have met with some success in this priority.

Our fifth and last priority is an increased role for the private sector. We would point here to our involvement with the IPDC, an offshoot of UNESCO, and with the ITU funding of grants to developing countries for training here with U.S. communications organizations.

To implement these priorities, I launched on July 15 a systematic, indepth review of each of the international organizations and programs in which we participate. In consultation with other bureaus and departments, we have met together on several of these. Our deadline for completion is September 15. Here we ask the questions of ourselves as to the effectiveness of the international organizations, weighing the benefits and the costs of our participation. Our goal is to insure that these organizations promote both American and world interests.

Finally, let me indicate what I see to be the two greatest problems that are before us. One deals with the introduction of extraneous political elements into the international organizations. The second deals with lack of discipline financially throughout the system.

Through my extensive consultations with secretariats and some 58 member governments, we have stressed time and time again the need for fiscal restraint. Our success in dealing with both of these problems, extraneous political issues and financial indiscipline, may well determine the future health of international organizations.

I appreciate this opportunity to appear before the committee. In sum, my attitude is neither cynical nor overly optimistic. Our desire is to seek to strengthen our

Statement by President Reagan, April 18, 1983 [10]

Support For UNICEF's Efforts To Bring a "Health Revolution" to the World's Children

For nearly a quarter of a century the United States has generously offered resources and know-how to give a better, healthier life to ill and malnourished people throughout the world. Despite past efforts and progress by the United States and many other countries, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) recently reported that over 40,000 children in developing countries still die every day, victims of malnutrition and disease. This is a tragedy of global proportions and requires a global effort in response.

UNICEF is now pursuing a "health revolution" for children in developing countries that involves a new combination of technological and social approaches to health. It is estimated that this combination, coupled with networks of trained health workers backed by government services and international assistance, can save the lives of 20,000 children each day within a decade. Moreover, literally hundreds of millions of young lives would be healthier.

One technological achievement has been the development and distribution of an inexpensive home treatment for diarrhea, a major contributor to deaths among young children in developing countries. This treatment was developed after years of research in the International Center for Diarrheal Disease Research in Bangladesh. The United States has contributed to that institution for more than 20 years. The World Health Organization has also been a focal point for international support and study of diarrheal diseases.

A second element is the development of low-cost vaccines which do not require refrigeration and which can be used in remote areas to protect children from such killers as measles, diphtheria, tetanus, whooping cough, polio, and tuberculosis.

Another factor is the promotion of breast feeding for its nutritional and hygienic value, as well as its immunological qualities. Still another is a simple infant weight chart kept by the child's mother which indicates a child's progress at monthly weighings, making malnutrition quickly detectable. Its design and use have been improved and tested in U.S.-supported maternal child health programs around the world. UNICEF has found that a great portion of malnutrition cases are due to the problem going undetected rather than lack of food in the family.

The American people have always been in the vanguard of support for children's health and well-being. As President of the United States, I am asking the American people to help bring about a health revolution for children during the coming decade by supporting UNICEF's humanitarian program.

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, May 19, 1983 [11]

"The Importance to Our Nation of the Growing Proliferation of U.N. Regulations"

Thank you, Senator Pressler. I am very pleased to be here and I would like to begin by saying that we, in the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, and the Bureau of International Organizations at the State Department, the Reagan administration, the permanent bureaucracy, I think, throughout the U.S. Government share your concern.

I am very pleased that the U.S. Senate and you, Senator Pressler, with the holding of these hearings have recognized and institutionalized your concern with the importance to our Nation of the growing proliferation of United Nations regulations.

As the U.S. business community is coming increasingly to realize, this is a matter of great importance to the whole American economy. It is also a matter of importance to the economic well-being of the world and to economic freedom and, indeed, freedom in the world.

The involvement of the United Nations in regulatory activities is not new. Many of the specialized agencies in the U.N. system have long been involved in areas affecting international commerce such as maritime safety, international air travel, patent and copyright protection, and the like. Some of this is very beneficial.

What is new is the extraordinary proliferation of U.N. regulatory initiatives in recent years. What is new especially is the growing politicization, the growing tendency to use regulation as an ideological weapon and a political weapon in world economic and political combat. In fact, this subject, as you know, I discussed at some length in my article on "Global Paternalism: The U.N. and the New International Regulatory Order," and I will recap some of the points I made in that article.

SENATOR PRESSLER. That was an excellent article and, with unanimous consent, we will place that in the record. [12]

AMBASSADOR KIRKPATRICK. Thank you, Senator Pressler.

I think, first of all, it is notable that the range of U.N. regulatory efforts has become astonishingly wide. Where they used to be narrowly focused, today they address a broad range of issues, including international transportation, shipping, international communications, direct satellite broadcasting—all of which are issues that have great importance to the future as well as the present—trans-border data flow. We have been very deeply concerned at the development of regulatory obstacles to the free flow of information.

U.N. efforts are currently in the works dealing with such broad areas of economic life as consumer protection and the activities and treatment of transnational corporations. The U.S. Mission to the United Nations keeps in regular touch with a range of American business and labor executives in order to remain informed about these issues. Other U.N. initiatives focus on specific products or industries such as, to take two famous cases, infant formula and pesticides.

There is a very great diversity in the format assumed by U.N.-sponsored regulatory activity. Some of the regulatory activity takes the form of binding agreements which, after they have been ratified by governments, have the force of law. Those are very easy to recognize.

Others are issued only as recommendations by expert bodies or in the form of voluntary, nonbinding codes or guidelines approved by intergovernmental organizations. These latter types of regulation do not have the legal force of law, but they can be influential in their impact on international business, because when standards and norms are adopted by a wide range of nations with universal or nearly universal endorsement they assume a kind of moral and political force that has a major influence on practices inside countries. They are not lightly challenged by single nations, much less by industries. Such international standards become, then, the basis for national legislation in a lot of countries, particularly Third World countries.

Given the great diversity of U.N. regulations, their subjects and their formats, it is difficult to generalize about them, but I would like to try just a few generalizations. One you have already mentioned concerning their source, U.N. regulation has proliferated because the growing interdependence of our world, the greater complexity of technology, the heightening levels of international economic cooperation, have increased the need for regulations.

Nobody doubts the need for some kinds of international regulation to protect everybody, not just less developed nations, but everybody. The United Nations sometimes serves as a useful forum in which constructive agreements can be reached. What is very disturbing, however, is the growing politicization of the efforts at regulation in the U.N. system.

This politicization is a problem for all U.N. activities and throughout the U.N. system. One of the sources of this politicization is, of course, the doctrine of the new international economic order [NIEO].[13] The new international economic order is a dream about what the world might look like if it were restructured on the basis of global socialism.

The bottom line of the new international economic order is a massive transfer of wealth and resources on the one hand, but, perhaps most important of all, a transfer of power—power over decisions that affect our lives. You could say that it is a transfer from the more developed countries to the less developed countries, but I do not believe that is the case. I believe it is a transfer of power from decisionmaking in more developed countries to a new breed of international bureaucrat and a new breed of international political operator.

It could result in a mortal blow to market economies and the ability of market economies and free economic systems to operate effectively in the world.

Another closely related source of politicization is dislike of multinational corporations. Multinational corporations have come to enjoy very low prestige at the United Nations partly doubtless because they have engaged sometimes in some practices which they should not have, but also because they are the principal targets of this ideology which is very hostile to free market economics. I would say it is hostile to free market development as well.

The multinationals are cast as the villains in the new international economic order. I have had extraordinary conversations with top executives of American multinational corporations about the difficulties which they have had in the last decade in even maintaining high level contact with U.N. decisionmaking bodies engaged in attempts at regulation of their kind of enterprise.

Many U.N. regulatory initiatives, we believe, could be more appropriately and effectively addressed at the national level by national governments than at the international level. The hostility of the dominant ideology in the U.N. system to business gets transmitted through projected regulatory codes to nations and encourages them to adopt standards and practices which they would not do if they were simply trying to engage in national decisionmaking.

That means that the kinds of decisions and policies that are adopted, that are inspired by U.N. regulatory codes, are likely to be different than the kinds of policies that will be adopted by nations left to their own devices. We think that a good many of the organizations and groups in the world that are hostile to business and free enterprise are, therefore, particularly attracted to international regulation as a mechanism for implementing their ideologies and for spreading their kinds of policies.

[13] The New International Economic Order refers to a proposal to eliminate the economic and social disparity between the developed and developing countries. The proposal emphasizes the need for redistribution of wealth and sharing of resources by nations of the world. Areas of action include raw materials, food, general trade, transportation and insurance, industrialization, transfer of technology, and regulation and control over transnational corporations' activities. For further information, see U.N. General Assembly Resolutions 3201 (S-VI) and 3202 (S-VI) in U.N. document A/9559. All bracketed notes are in the source text.

Why can the United States not be more effective in influencing the codes developed in the U.N. system? The answer to that is the politics of the United Nations. This committee has already heard me discuss this issue.

The political arithmetic that prevails in the U.N. system puts us at an enormous disadvantage. The votes are distributed in the General Assembly and in most of the bodies of the United Nations on the basis of one country/one vote. Now a very large portion of those countries have very little economic experience in modern economics and modern production; furthermore, countries are organized into blocs in the U.N. system. The U.N. features politics in which blocs function very much like political parties in the Congress, and the biggest bloc that is influential in the economic area is, of course, the G–77. [14]

The G–77 comprises nearly three-fourths of the total membership of U.N. bodies, so that on any given issue they can deliver the less-developed countries, who have the least experience with economic production and the least detailed knowledge about it. They can deliver a three-fourths majority, whereas the most developed countries, who have the most economic experience and the most to win or lose, the largest stake, are relegated to a kind of permanent minority. The United States and its partners in the OECD, for example, can muster less than one-sixth of the total vote in the typical U.N. arena, despite the fact that they produce nearly two-thirds of the world's gross national product and contribute over 70 percent of the U.N. budget.

Furthermore, the political unity of the OECD countries on economic issues is usually less reliable and frailer than the political unity of the G–77. One of the reasons for that is that in the U.N. system, as in the Congress, if you want to be successful you have to do a good deal of political wheeling and dealing and vote trading, and if you want a country's votes on one issue you may have to give them your votes on another. Some of the economic issues are the ones in which the developed countries, our OECD partners, often make compromises.

Another reason we do not do better, is that the United States and the Western countries have not been very vigorously engaged in ideological debate. We almost abandoned the field about 10 or 15 years ago, and have not made the case for the benefits of a free economy.

In this administration, we have tried to persuade our colleagues in the United Nations to look at the record to see which kinds of policies lead to economic development and which kinds lead to stagnation, and we have tried to make the case that they will be better off if they take another good, hard look at the new international economic order.

But it is a long road back to influence and to get fair treatment for free market economics in both theory and practice. Meanwhile, I think we simply have to stand alone if necessary. We have demonstrated that we can do that.

We would much rather stand with the other industrialized countries and we would much rather stand with the countries of the Third World who are themselves really interested in economic development for their own people in their own countries. But, if we have to, we will stand alone, as we have done on several occasions. The goal of our diplomacy and our diplomatic politics, however, must be to minimize the situations in which we stand alone and maximize our support or influence in the system.

The latest example of U.N. regulation, and one which I know you are concerned about, is the draft guidelines for consumer protection, which are slated to come before the summer session of the Economic and Social Council [ECOSOC] in Geneva this summer. [15] ECOSOC's involvement in this issue dates back to 1977. It arose from a concern that the developing countries did not have adequate capabilities in the field of consumer protection to protect themselves and that, therefore, they needed help from the United Nations.

Various reports and resolutions on this subject culminated in a 1981 ECOSOC

[14] Formed in 1964 by 75 developing countries during the first U.N. Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD I), the Group of 77 acquired its present name after its membership had expanded by two. Currently representing about 121 Third World nations, it has functioned as a caucus for economic matters in many forums, particularly in the United Nations.

[15] For text of the draft submitted to the summer session, see U.N. document E/1983/71.

resolution calling on the U.N. Secretariat to elaborate a set of general guidelines for consumer protection. In accordance with this mandate, the Secretariat of the United Nations compiled a set of draft guidelines, circulated to member States last fall. [16]

The United States has submitted very extensive comments on these proposed guidelines. Eventually, the revised draft guidelines will appear in a document that also summarizes the comments of the member States. This document will be issued by the U.N. Secretariat prior to the July meeting of ECOSOC, and will serve as the basis for negotiations on the final decisions to be made in Geneva in the summer. [17]

Now we are still at a rather preliminary stage in the drafting of these guidelines and nothing is in concrete yet. But we are on the way and molds are made, and what I would like to do is just comment very briefly on the shape, as it were, of those molds in which the concrete may be set and what disturbs us about them, why we think we may not be able to vote for them unless they undergo some significant changes.

First, I note that the original guidelines contain a number of specific provisions that were seriously prejudicial to American interests and the interests of American business. The original guidelines certainly were not acceptable to us. We hope that our comments and criticisms of these guidelines may result in sufficient revision that there will be eventually not only a set of guidelines which we could vote for but one which would not be damaging, in fact, to the consumers of the world.

We share the concern with consumer protection. Obviously our country supports effective consumer protection. Obviously we at U.S.U.N. support effective consumer protection. We believe, however, that the primary responsibility for consumer protection rests with each nation. We do not believe that ultimate responsibility for consumer protection resides i some global organization which we thin does not even have the capacity to mak prudent decisions about consumer prote tion.

We believe that an important goal consumer policy should be to maximi consumer choice. We believe, of cours that economic competition is one impo tant means of maximizing consum choice.

We believe that international tra serves the interests of consumers and believe very deeply that policies present in the guise of consumer protecti should not be used as nontariff barriers trade. We think there is a real danger policies being presented in the guise consumer protection whose real goal, a certainly whose function, will be to se as nontariff barriers to international tra

We believe that the costs of regulati internationally as well as nationa should be considered along with the be fits in deciding on the advisability of c sumer protection measures. We believe nally, not only that nations, rather t global bodies, should have the fundam tal responsibility for the protection their consumers, but that consum themselves ought to have some right decide among competing values.

Let me give you an example. One cern of the consumer protection gu lines which have been formulated in Secretariat is that products, foodstuffs example, should be harmonious with tural forms existing in the various na of the world.

Now we Americans live in a socie which we can choose often among ucts that seem consistent with our cu and those that do not. We have food that are presented in oriental for French form, in German form, in A form. We like to have a choice a products that are not necessarily co ent with our indigenous culture.

We think cultural heterogeneity riching, not threatening. We se reason that some international should deprive people in the less oped worlds of the possibilities of e encing the rich choice among produ different cultures and packages of ent cultures. We hate to think an in [16] For text, see ECOSOC Resolution 1981/62, July 23, 1981. The draft guidelines compiled by the U.N. Secretariat and distributed to member states were not published.

[17] Comments by member states on the draft guidelines were not published. U.N. document E/1983/71 summarizes member states' comments, but does not identify which states made specific comments. For text of the final decisions on the guidelines made at the 1983 ECOSOC session, see ECOSOC decision 1983/174, July 28, 1983.

tional regulatory body would deprive countries in Africa, for example, of the pleasures of French food, if some African consumers preferred French food.

Former British colonial countries might find that their culture was consistent with British food and not with French food or Japanese food, but we see no reason that just because they had the bad luck to be British colonies or French colonies or whatever, they ought to be limited forever to foodstuffs consistent with that colonial tradition or their own indigenous precolonial traditions.

I think the point is clear. We believe that the requirements of cultural consistency are vague, amorphous and would lead to arbitrary regulations which are punitive toward individuals and also punitive toward American business and very likely to function as nontariff trade barriers.

I wish that I could tell you that at the end of this current process there will be guidelines that the United States will find it possible to support. Frankly, I am not sure. All I can tell you at this stage is that we will do our best, as indeed we are doing, to take account of the conflicting values and we will give priority to legitimate concerns of consumer safety.

We will take into account in all of our reflections on this the safety and health and well-being of persons in areas of the world that may not have adequate national facilities for protecting themselves. We are not indifferent to those concerns, but neither do we believe that under the guise of protecting health and safety new codes of arbitrary international regulation should be imposed.

Thank you, Senator Pressler.

Statement Issued by the U.S. Mission to the United Nations, New York, September 19, 1983 [18]

"The United States Takes Its Responsibilities as Host Country Seriously"

Ambassador Lichenstein's remarks this morning in the United Nations Host Country Relations Committee should be understood in the broader context in which they were made. He was responding to a hostile attack by the Soviet delegate who charged, among other things, that the United States was not a suitable host country for the United Nations because it was conspiring to violate its obligations to the United Nations. [19] The same theme, it should be recalled, was touched on in the TASS statement last Saturday which announced that Foreign Minister Gromyko would not be attending the session of the U.N. General Assembly that begins tomorrow. [20]

Ambassador Lichenstein called these charges "A palpable falsehood," as indeed they are. The United States believes that, in making arrangements for Mr. Gromyko's safe and prompt arrival here, it is [19] Neither the text of Lichenstein's statement nor that of the Soviet delegate was published. The New York Times reported that Lichenstein stated, "If in the judicious determination of the members of the United Nations, they feel that they are not welcome and that they are not being treated with the hostly consideration that is their due, then the United States strongly encourages such member states seriously to consider removing themselves and this organization from the soil of the United States. We will put no impediment in your way. The members of the U.S. Mission to the United Nations will be down at the dockside waving you a fond farewell as you sail into the sunset." The same article also quoted briefly the Soviet delegate's statement. See New York Times, September 20, 1983, p. A1. Summary records of the proceedings of the U.N. Committee on Host Country Relations were not published as part of a 3-year trial effort, begun at the end of 1982, to reduce committee meeting costs.

fully living up to both the letter and the spirit of our obligations as host country. These obligations, we believe, do not permit U.N. diplomats to fly in any time, anywhere, or by any means they choose. They do mean that convenient, safe, normal travel to and from the United Nations should be available. Just such travel is available to Mr. Gromyko. He is free to travel to the United States by any commercial airline in the world other than Aeroflot, which other Soviet delegates to the General Assembly will do. Or, if he prefers, he is free to arrive by Soviet military aircraft and land at a convenient, nearby airbase. In fact, the U.S. decision regarding Mr. Gromyko would have allowed him to enter the United States even after security considerations had led the Governors of New York and New Jersey to close civilian airports to Aeroflot planes.

The United States takes its responsibilities as host country seriously, and works very hard at making conditions here as secure and pleasant as possible. To suggest, as the Soviet delegate did today, that the United States is unfit to be host country because of Mr. Gromyko's decision not to come to this General Assembly, is in fact a provocation—to which Ambassador Lichenstein responded accordingly. His remarks should be understood as a response to a deliberate provocation, not as any new departure in U.S. policy.[21]

[21] President Reagan addressed Lichenstein's remarks during a September 21, 1983, meeting with regional editors and broadcasters. In response to a request for his thoughts on the issue, the President stated that he felt Lichenstein "had the hearty approval of most people in America in his suggestion that we weren't asking anyone to leave, but if they chose to leave, goodby." He closed his comments with, "And we'd permit them." For text, see Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, October 3, 1983, p. 1298.

Transcript of a White House Press Briefing, September 23, 1983[22]

The President's Trip to the United Nations

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. As you know, and as the schedule you will get indicates, the President is going to New York on the 25th and he will deliver a speech on the 26th to the U.N. General Assembly.[23] In addition, he will want to consult with Secretary-General Perez de Cuellar, and he will meet some of the world leaders who are there, and I will go into that in just a minute.

Every President since Truman has spoken to the UNGA. President Reagan spoke to the Special Session on disarmament on June 17, 1982.[24] The reason he is going this year is essentially that there are a number of major international issues that are very much on the front burner, including the KAL shoot down,[25] Central American issue, Middle East, relations with the Soviet Union and arms control, all of which he thinks need to be discussed with the General Assembly and our views put forward and also with some of the world leaders. I can't give you much on the speech itself, first of all, because it is still being written; secondly, because . . . will be background briefing on that on Monday.

Let me simply say that at this point that while there are all of these issues facing us, that the President's speech which will try to deal with them will do so in a manner in which there are some proposals for positive change. I think it is fair to say that it will particularly emphasize the importance of proceeding, moving ahead on arms control.

[22] Source: Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The briefing was conducted on background by senior administration officials in the Briefing Room of the White House beginning at 10:38 a.m.

[23] See document 4.

[25] Reference is to a September 1, 1983, incident, in which a Soviet military plane shot at and destroyed a civilian plane, Korean Airlines flight 007, which had strayed into Soviet airspace.

The President will be the first speaker at the General Assembly and we are hopeful that that speech will help to set the tone for the General Assembly sessions themselves. There will be some 14 heads of state or government and some 50 foreign ministers present in New York at the time the President gives his speech. He will, I understand, give a reception for heads of government, chiefs of state, foreign ministers, on Sunday night.

He will meet with the Secretary General of the United Nations, where he will reaffirm strong U.S. support for the United Nations. I emphasize that fact. He will, however, at the same time say that the United States feels strongly that we have got to recess [resist] politization—I can't even say it—politicization—I hope he can—(Laughter) of the U.N. specialized agencies, and he will indicate the U.S. Government's unwillingness to accept without strong response the growing tendencies in the U.N. toward a double standard.

He will stress that we want to make the United Nations a more effective organization, that we want to hold down budget growth while improving the efficiency. He will probably also make it clear, however, to the Secretary-General that he stands by his budget requests for the United Nations as submitted to the Congress and that he feels it is a reasonable request to the U.S. Congress, and that this administration can take substantial pride in the fact that we have worked over the last two years to hold down real budget growth within the United Nations. For example, real budget growth for the United Nations in the years 1983–1984—I'm sorry, 1984–1985 as against 1983–1984 will be .7 percent; seven-tenths of one percent as contrasted with 1982–1983.

Q. One more time, please?

Q. That is the real growth?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Real budget growth for the United Nations.

Q. How much?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. For the years '84–'85 will be seven-tenths of one percent as contrasted with '82–'83.

Q. Last night Congress voted against it. [26]

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I understand that.

Q. As contrasted with what for 1982?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. With the U.N. budget for 1983–1984.

Q. 1982–1983?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. 1982–1983.

Q. Do you know what the budget growth was?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The biennial budget for 1984–1985 is .7 percent more in real terms than the biennial budget for 1982–1983.

Q. What was the increase in 1982–1983? Do you know that?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. 1980–1981 to 1982–1983?

Q. Yes.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I am not sure.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We will find that out for you. A substantial reduction in the real budget growth rate is my point.

Q. Sir, what is that in real dollsrs, real money?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We will have to get you the figures. All I have is the percentage figures.

Q. You don't know how much we give now?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I don't know.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The President will also—

[26] Reference is to the September 22, 1983, Senate vote on Amendment 2201 to the Department of State authorization bill. The amendment, which proposed to restrict U.S. assessed payments to the United Nations, UNESCO, WHO, FAO, and ILO, passed the Senate by a vote of 66 for and 23 against. The funds were later restored to the Department of State budget by votes in both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Q. Will he veto it, sir?

Q. Will it be in the speech?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Let me finish. That question I don't know the answer to.

Q. I see.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Let me finish this and I can get, as I suspected you would want to, to the United Nations budget. (Laughter) In the meeting with the Secretary-General, he will also reaffirm our support for the Secretary-General's efforts in the Afghan negotiations, where we strongly support his efforts and the efforts of Mr. Cordovez [27] to arrive at a negotiated settlement for the withdrawal of Soviet forces from Afghanistan, and he will also indicate our support for the Secretary-General's efforts in Namibia and in Cyprus. He will meet, the President will meet as well with Prince Sihanouk and Son Sann. He will emphasize to them that the U.S. Government backs strongly the ASEAN strategy to obtain a comprehensive political settlement in Kampuchea, and his meeting with Prince Sihanouk and Son Sann will be a demonstration of this government's support for their efforts in fact to arrive at a reasonable settlement in Kampuchea.

The meeting will reflect our view that the non-Communist elements of the coalition led by Prince Sihanouk and Son Sann offer a credible alternative to the puppet regime now imposed on Kampuchea.

Q. Is that one meeting or two meetings?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. One, as I understand it. He will meet as well with Samuel Doe of Liberia. Mr. Doe has been particularly supportive of U.S. efforts in areas such as the Chad, and with regard to Israel, and we will want to make it clear to him that we appreciate those efforts. The meeting will also reaffirm our support for Liberia's return to constitutional government and the President will also indicate that we are ready to help as we can in Liberia's economic development. The President will meet with Jorge Illueca, who is the President of the 38th General Assembly. He is from Panama. It is essentially a courtesy call. He will meet as well with King Hassan II of Morocco. I think you all know that we regard our relations with Morocco as particularly important and the President will want to spend a good bit of time talking with the King about Lebanon—in specific terms, the Middle East; more generally the Western Sahara—and bilateral issues again including economic relationships.

Finally, the President will also meet with Prime Minister Indira Gandhi. As you know, India is now the chairman of the nonaligned movement and the President will want to spend a good bit of time talking with her about nonalignment and its role in the world and her views of world events and to indicate to her in advance of the summit that Mrs. Gandhi has called in New York [28] our interest in a close relationship with the nonaligned movement. The President won't be able to attend the summit sessions himself but he intends to use the meeting with Mrs. Gandhi to try to indicate to her our views on many of the issues that will be discussed at that summit. We will also want to discuss bilateral problems and issues with Mrs. Gandhi in the aftermath of her visit here last year and indicate again our desire to continue what we think has been a rather substantial improvement in that bilateral relationship since her visit.

I will now be glad to try to answer your questions. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you be more explicit about the double standard that you said the President is going to tell Perez de Cuellar that we are no longer willing to accept?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It is our general view—well, let me give you an example if I may of the—I am not now speaking for the President—but as an example of the double standard that I think we in this administration tend to find disturbing. The Security Council was, in the last analysis, unable to arrive at a resolution dealing with the events that the Chad and Libyan intervention in that country

[27] Diego Cordóvez, the U.N. Secretary-General's personal representative.

[28] Reference is to informal meetings held in New York on September 27 and 29, 1983. Leaders from approximately 25 nations met to discuss peace, arms control, and the international economy. The meetings were organized by Indira Gandhi in her capacity as chairman of the nonaligned nations. Although the meetings were held in U.N. facilities, they were not sponsored by the United Nations. No U.S. representatives attended, nor was any summary report of the proceedings issued.

[sic] despite the fact that, in our view, the evidence of intervention is clear and we think that the condemnation, therefore, naturally should have flowed therefrom. With regard to the Korean airliner shoot down, we were more successful and, in fact, the Soviets were forced to veto that resolution, but even there there were some countries which felt it necessary to abstain from the vote, and I must say it is an abstention that we did not understand. And our view is that there tends to be these days within the United Nations a willingness to accept conduct on the part of other countries or at least not to react strongly against it and at the same time, then, react strongly when actions are taken by some Western countries that do not meet with full approbation by the United Nations. Yes, sir.

Q. If I could follow that up, why then, to make another part of your statement clearer, is not an action like the Senate action on the funding a tangible and concrete signal of that displeasure?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think Ambassador Kirkpatrick made the point well yesterday;[29] that the issue in terms of the double standard is the governments conduct themselves in the United Nations in ways that we think are, to put it mildly, unwise. That is not to say that we do not believe that the organization as such serves a useful purpose and should continue, and that is not just pointing to the specialized agencies that do substantial good work but in addition the importance of maintaining a United Nations which permits members to debate with one another and to air issues. We are not saying that the United Nations as an institutional or an organization does not serve a purpose. We are saying, however, that we are substantially unhappy with the way in which a number of countries express their views within the United Nations and we intend to react when they do so. We are not saying that they don't have a right to do it. We also are saying that we think it is unwise to cut the U.N.'s budget.

Q. Is there any way in which this administration thinks that displeasure can be shown other than the President's stating it? I mean if you have ruled out the budget cutting, is there any specific or concrete action you could contemplate taking?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think the answer to that is that the way in which we think it best to deal with this issue is to be very precise about our feeling and our reaction that we do not, again to state it specifically, we do not agree with the proposed budget cut. We do, however—and this is related to questions of efficiency and expenditures of money—we do believe that it is important for the United Nations to take major efforts to cut its budget growth which we think has been too fast and too much and that there are inefficiencies within the United Nations that can very well be dealt with by holding down budget growth.

Q. In broad terms, can you give us an idea on the speech as to whether we are going to hear strong language, anti-Soviet language or whether that is going to be qualified somewhat and is the emphasis going to be more on arms control in terms of the Soviet-U.S. relationship rather than KAL?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I am reluctant to try at this point to answer that question very specifically. I think there is no question because the speech is still in the works, but I think there is no question the President is going to make it clear our view of the state of our relationships with the Soviets and their conduct, including the Korean Airline's tragedy. I think it is also clear, however, that the President will in the speech be making suggestions on a range of issues for positive steps to try to improve the international atmosphere and I think it safe to say that a subject—well, a major portion of the speech will deal with arms control, which we believe and the President believes certainly to be one of the areas that is most in need of serious attention. Yes, ma'am?

Q. Sir, I don't see any place on here where the President is going to be greeted by or confer with our Ambassador there.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think she will. I don't know how she is going to greet him, but she will be present with the meeting with Perez de Cuellar and my assumption is that Ambassador Kirkpatrick will accompany the President throughout the whole visit up there. I have to assume that they will probably get together at some point when he first arrives. Yes, sir?

Q. . . . do you believe that if the budget cuts in the Senate voted last night were to stand that it would over the long run damage U.S. interests and give the Soviets a propaganda edge?

[29] Kirkpatrick's statement has not been further identified.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think it would damage U.S. interests. Whether it gives the Soviets a propaganda edge or not I don't know, the point being that we believe that the maintenance of a strong U.S. role within the United Nations is important to U.S. interests; and that the United Nations can serve useful purposes in maintaining the peace. Again, that is not to say that we don't have substantial disagreement with the way in which some members of the United Nations of late have been conducting themselves. Yes, sir?

Q. . . . how do your remarks just now about our support of the United Nations square with Mr. Lichenstein's remark the other day and particularly with the President's virtual endorsement of what Mr. Lichenstein said? [30] It seems to me we are hearing two voices out of this.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I don't think that is right at all. And I devoutly hope I am in sync with my President, but I really don't think that is the case at all.

What Ambassador Lichenstein was saying—what the President said in support of that statement was not that the United States ought to get out of the United Nations, or that the United Nations ought to get out of the United States, but rather, as the Ambassador made clear, if there are some countries in the United Nations who are dissatisfied with the way in which we carry out our obligations as hosts, they have a perfect right to move or move the United Nations if they can get sufficient other countries to agree with them, and we are not going to stand in the way of that. We feel we have met our obligations as hosts to the United Nations. We will continue to meet those obligations and those who complain about the way we carry it out can look for other alternatives if they wish. And, I don't think that that is in any way in contradiction to our and my saying that we believe the United States or the United Nations serves a useful purpose for the United States.

Q. If that is the statement of policy, . . . why did both the State Department and the White House say it was not policy, that Lichenstein was just speaking for himself immediately after he said it?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I have just told you what I thought the statement of policy was, that the United States continues to believe it is useful to maintain itself in the United Nations and the United Nations in the United States. What Ambassador Lichenstein said, he said as a personal statement, but I and the President have no trouble with the point he made which is if you don't like the way we are managing the process of being hosts here, you can find some other solution.

Q. Let me ask it this way. In 1945 we campaigned rather strongly to make sure that the United Nations would be in the United States. Would we do so again if there was a movement to get the United Nations out of the United States? Apparently you are saying now, and the President has said, and Lichenstein has said, that we wouldn't stand in the way if that is what they wanted to do. Would we not fight such a move?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think it is clear if the majority of the United Nations wanted to move it somewhere else, we would not stand in the way.

Q. That is right. Would you fight the majority in doing it?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. My answer to that would be, we have to face the circumstance at the time. I don't know whether we would fight it or not. Our view is that it is useful for it to continue in New York. It is useful for the United States to be a member of the United Nations. And since it is a wholly hypothetical question of what we would do if a number of people tried to get it out of the United States, I can't answer the question.

Q. Who are some of the countries in the United Nations that we are substantially unhappy with, as you say?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I would rather not go into too much detail, although I can point out to you, as I said, that our lack of enthusiasm for the abstention at the time of the Korean shootdown ought to give you some hint.

Q. Why?

[30] See supra.

Q. Why is that "the double standard" which you mentioned, to use a quote?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I can give you some personal attempts at an answer to that, but I don't know that they are necessarily terribly helpful. It is my personal view that there are a number of reasons for the double standard, one of which is that it is fairly clear to me that the way in which the Soviet Union conducts its foreign policy tends to frighten a good many other countries far more than the way in which we conduct our foreign policy, and I think we are doing ours the right way. But I think there is no question that a number of countries particularly amongst the developing world see the dangers of irritating the Soviet Union as leading to consequences that they would find unpleasant substantially more often than would be the case if they upset the United States. Yes, ma'am.

Q. That's right. What exactly has the United States done, I mean the United Nations done for the United States?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. We are getting way off the President's visit. But you know, the basic point again is that it is our view that the United Nations does serve a worthwhile purpose because it permits countries to come together to debate. The United Nations has in fact put forces into a number of trouble spots around the world that have in fact helped to maintain the peace.

The United Nations is, for example, useful on the surprise issue, UNIFIL has made a difference in the past in Lebanon, the United Nations has served the purposes of peace on a number of occasions. That is not to say we are by any means wholly satisfied with his conduct . . .

Q. . . . your criticism of the double standard seems more aimed not so much at the United Nations as against the nonaligned block whose members generally vote the way you are criticizing.

My only question is, why doesn't the President make his views about this double standard known, not so much to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, but to Mrs. Gandhi?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think you can ask that—well, you know, I don't think the President is going to ask Mrs. Gandhi to carry his water with a number of other States. I think you can assume that on occasion we will make it clear to those governments concerned that we are not enamored of their conduct.

Please, and I know I knew when I got here that the questions were going to focus on budget and so forth. Please understand that the President's trip to New York and the purpose of that trip is not by any means primarily to go up there and spend his time telling people about our unhappiness with double standards or the budget and so forth. He is going there to make a speech about major international issues and to try to put before the American people and the United Nations our view and some suggestions on how those issues ought to be dealt with.

I can't deny to you that the subject of the U.S. role within the United Nations and views of the United Nations is inevitably going to be a subject discussed up there, given the public discussion on that subject of the last week or so.

Yes?

Q. Specifically, what arms control issues is he going to take up in his UNGA speech?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Again, I don't want to get too specific until I have had a chance to look at a later draft of the speech. But by and large, I think it would be obvious. One is the strategic arms talks and another is clearly the intermediate-range nuclear force discussions in Geneva.

Q. Is that on background?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. If you want me to go beyond that, you are going to have to wait a few days and listen to George Shultz on the subject.

Yes, ma'am?

Q. Can you tell us how the U.S. contribution to the United Nations has increased over the period that you cited?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Well, I will ask . . . —there have been substantial increases in the U.N. budget, both the general budget and in the specialized agencies and by the way, one of the areas where we are working the hardest is on holding down budget, real budget growth in the specialized agencies where our general policy in all of them has been to argue strenuously for zero growth, zero growth in the specialized agencies.

We have not always succeeded in holding to that but we have, I think, held it down in a number of them, and if you are going to push me on the specifics and budget figures, I am going to have trouble here but we will be glad to try to get that all together for you.

. . . , do you have anything you want to add?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I don't think so. I might say the U.N. budget has grown three-fold over the past 10 years.

Q. You don't know what our contribution is?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. 25 percent.

Q. It has grown 25 percent?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

Q. I know it is 25 percent. Would you tell us how our contribution to the United Nations has grown or not grown over the past few years?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It has grown in the same proportion.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. If the budget has grown three-fold in the last 10 years, the U.S. contribution has grown three-fold in the last 10 years.

Q. That is not my question.

Q. Ours has grown .7 percent?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

Q. If the budget, if the 25 percent grows, if it is always 25 percent, and the U.N. budget grows a tenth of a percent, that our contribution grows seven-tenths of a percent; is that correct?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. That is correct.

Q. Is that threefold in real terms?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No.

Q. What is it in real terms?

Q. Sir, what does that mean in money? You must know.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I don't know. I am sorry. I will be glad to get it for you.

Q. Why not?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Because I don't know, because I don't know, but we will be glad to get you the figures.

Q. Does the President regret the fact that the Soviet delegation will not be led by either foreign minister or head of government? Does he feel that will hinder his message on arms control getting through?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I haven't talked to the President about it but I would imagine his view of that is it is up to the Soviet Union to decide who they send. That is their business not ours.

Q. The Soviet Union will not be represented at this reception then, is that correct, because Gromyko is not going to be there?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I frankly don't know the answer to that. Have they been invited?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. The invitation is to the head of state, head of government and the foreign minister. None of those are there—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. They will not be present.

Q. Does the President feel neutral about that or do you think that the United States regrets that?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think the view of those with whom I have spoken on the subject which, as I indicated, don't include the President is, we feel neutral on the subject. It is not a matter of great concern to us one way or the other.

Q. Has the Soviet Union ever contributed to the United Nations?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes.

Q. It is not a matter of concern to you whether the Soviets are headed by a top ranking official or not?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. That is their choice to make.

Q. They don't bother—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. That is their choice to make.

Q. Is the administration sad with Mrs. Gandhi's response to the Korean airliner shoot down?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I think that, I guess the best way to answer that question is to say that there are a number of countries that we would have wished were a bit more vociferous in their condemnation of that act and I wouldn't want to be any more specific than that.

Q. On the arms control part of the speech, without giving us any details, do you want to say for the Secretary, will the President tell us a little bit more about the new instructions to Mr. Nitze? [31]

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I would not be surprised.

Q. Given the U.S. behavior on the Gromyko airplane episode, and Mr. Lichenstein's comments and the President's comments and the Senate vote and perhaps even your comments today about the displeasure of the way the votes have gone for the United States recently, is there, frankly, some need felt by the administration for the President to reassure the United Nations of the U.S. support?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. In light of the comments over the last several weeks, and particularly the Senate vote, I guess I would say that it is probable, you know, I must say we haven't thought about it in the terms in which you have asked, but I have to say I think it is going to be important to make it clear that the United States continues to support the United Nations and continues, and this administration continues to believe in the budget it submitted to the Congress with regard to contributions to the United Nations. Yes, I think that is probably a fair statement.

Q. Is the United States concerned overall—what you seem to be saying earlier. Is the United States concerned about the influence of the Soviet Union and Soviet bloc countries that are now exercising in the United Nations? Is that a major concern now?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. I don't know that it is a major concern. Obviously, it is a concern when in our view there is a tendency to apply a double standard. That has got to be a concern to us and because it is of concern to us we are talking about it publicly and we will be talking about it in New York. But, again, within the context of understanding we are talking as Ambassador Kirkpatrick said about the conduct of states within the United Nations, not in terms of the United Nations as an organization having a double standard. . . .

Q. Just to be a little more precise—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. That is what I was afraid of.

Q. Is our support for the U.N. budget and our contribution, say, also extending to all the specialized agencies.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes.

Q. Specifically UNESCO?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. You know, except as you know we are now in the process of reexamination of our role within UNESCO and I can't say what when that reexamination is completed will be our findings.

But what I am saying is our support for the U.N. system includes also support for the specialized agencies but with the qualification that we are going to look at the budgets of each of the specialized agencies, and make our decisions on how much if at all they ought to grow on the basis of what they do and how efficient we think they are and with the qualification that we are now looking at UNESCO as a specific institution and our judgments of our place in it.

Yes, Ma'am.

Q. Will the speech include anything new on START?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. At this point, I want to hold that for the Secretary. The answer is I don't know yet exactly what it is going to say on START.

Q. On Cambodia—

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Yes.

Q. There is a widely held belief in New York that all these comments about the United Nations and the flap about Lichen-

[31] President Reagan summarized Nitze's new instructions in his September 26 speech before the U.N. General Assembly.

stein and the Senate vote have in fact hurt American interests particularly in letting the President speak about U.S.-Soviet relations and focusing worldwide attention on Soviet behavior. Is what you are doing here this morning an attempt to really clear out the underbrush and get the focus back on Soviet behavior and KAL?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. It is not what I am doing here this morning. You know, I did not come here surprised with the fact that I have talked about the United States in the United Nations more than I intended because that is what the questions have been about. But the purpose and that is why I said it earlier—the purpose of the President going to New York is not primarily or even secondarily to try to reassure people about the United States and the United Nations. It is to go there to speak about a range of international issues that are damned important and that need to be dealt with. Now I cannot say having said all of that that the issue won't come up. I am sure it will. And I have indicated to you that I think the President will himself raise it in his conversations with the Secretary-General.

Yes, sir?

Q. The double standard as you have mentioned it is not something new.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No. It is not. Somebody mentioned the last several years and I should have said it is not a new phenomenon.

Q. Is there a point in time where this double standard has increased or have you all just drawn the line with the KAL shootdown?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. No. I think our judgment is that while it is a longstanding problem, it has gotten worse in the last, certainly in the last decade, and probably in the last few years. And I am not saying we have drawn a line but we are making it clear that we don't look with particular favor on the way in which things have gone. I think it is also fair to say that what has brought this to a head in terms of public discussion of late was the decision by Mr. Gromyko not to come to New York because he didn't want to get clobbered the way he had in Madrid [32] and his use of the issue of where he would land and what he would come in on as an excuse for not coming here. But I think that has drawn attention to the subject and I think, therefore, it is natural that the conversation, the discussions are going to center on this issue now.

It is what led to the Soviets saying what they said which led Ambassador Lichenstein saying what he said. But I think a triggering event has been this question of Gromyko coming to the United Nations.

. . . Let's take one more question.

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. One more question.

Yes, sir?

Q. Is the President going to make clear in some of these meetings in the United Nations that the United States will [support] [33] higher foreign aid to support the United Nations?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Not so far as I am aware, no.

Q. Or to their votes in the United Nations?

SENIOR ADMINISTRATION OFFICIAL. Not so far as I am aware. No.

Q. There seem to be many threats here.

THE PRESS. Thank you.

Proclamation by President Reagan, September 27, 1983 [34]

United Nations Day, 1983

The United Nations remains today—38 years after its creation—an institution uniquely endowed to promote international political, economic, social, and technical cooperation. Conceived during a brutal war and nurtured in a troubled peace, the United Nations has seen many of its shining promises realized, but many others have been frustrated. More often than the world community can afford, rivalries and divisions among states prompt abuse or misuse of the powers and machinery of the United Nations. Despite these imperfections, the system and its machinery continue to offer opportunities for mediating differences which threaten to erupt in hostilities; for arranging and overseeing agreements to end tensions or conflicts; for promoting the technical and scientific cooperation essential to meet problems of growth and development; and for coping with international emergencies of all kinds.

The people and the Government of the United States of America take pride in the support—moral, intellectual, political, and financial—which we have rendered to the United Nations, and in the leadership which we have provided to help bring about its foremost achievements. We also take pride in the knowledge that the principles of the United Nations charter are the same ones which underlie our liberty, our progress, and our development as a democratic society.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, RONALD REAGAN, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate Monday, October 24, 1983, as United Nations Day, and urge all Americans to better acquaint themselves with the activities and accomplishments of the United Nations.

I have appointed William M. Ellinghaus to serve as 1983 United States Chairman for United Nations Day, and I welcome the role of the United Nations Association of the United States of America in working with him to celebrate this special day.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-seventh day of September, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and eighth.

Statement by the Representative at the United Nations (Kirkpatrick) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, October 3, 1983 [35]

"Responsibility for Financing the United Nations"

Thank you very much.

I would like to say, as always, I am honored and pleased to appear before this subcommittee of Congress.

I believe very deeply in the important role of Congress in the formulation and the oversight of U.S. foreign policy.

I should like to make clear at the outset that I respect the institution in which I represent the United States, and have the highest regard for the integrity and skill of Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar and his principal lieutenants, and that I believe that effective U.S. participation in the United Nations is an important aspect of our foreign policy.

I also fully share the Congress' concern with the spiraling growth of the U.N. budget and bureaucracy, and the frustration and conviction expressed in the Senate's overwhelming vote, that the United States should not simply acquiesce in this seemingly uncontrolled process. [36]

The U.N. budget has nearly tripled in the last decade, during which inflation in the United States amounted to about 115 percent. And even in this statist age it is difficult to find a government whose bureaucracy has grown at rates that equal that of this U.N. bureaucracy during the last decade.

We in the Reagan administration have tried hard to slow this rampant growth. I believe that our predecessors also worked hard to control the growth of the U.N. budget.

I believe that Secretary General de Cuellar is working hard on this problem.

He has, in fact, undertaken a major economy campaign which may bear fruit this year, but none of our efforts could have reasonably been called successful as of the end of the fiscal year 1983. The budget continued to grow, and at a very unacceptable rate.

Now, various factors I believe are involved in that growth of the U.N. budget. One certainly is worldwide inflation; another, and a very important one to take into account, is the increasing peacekeeping operation of the United Nations. About one-third of the U.S. assessment is spent for peacekeeping. Each of these have played their role, but fundamentally the problems of U.N. budget growth are structural. They derive from the fact that the budget is finally determined by a majority of members that can add on and on and on without themselves incurring the brunt of the additional costs.

Specifically 85 member states of the 157 total membership in the last fiscal year—we now have 158 with the addition of St. Christopher-Nevis, but 85 of that 157 pay a total of only 1.75 percent of the budget, while the United States, which pays 25 percent, has only 1/157th of the decisionmaking power, or we can say the Soviet Union, which pays 14 percent, has 1/157th of the decisionmaking power.

Responsibility for financing the United Nations is thus, in effect, vested in a very small minority of its richest and most powerful members, while authority to control the budget lies with the voting majority.

From this distribution, this disjunction of power and responsibility flows the fact that those countries who have the votes don't pay the bills, while those who pay the bills don't have the votes.

Last year's experiences seem to be a case study that illustrates the problem and its tenacity.

We need to be aware, first, that the process of budgetmaking features input from the various sections of the U.N. Secretariat, which the Secretary General requests some 18 months in advance of his own recommendations. He gets input from the General Assembly in the form of resolutions which mandate new activities, review by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, review by the Committee for Programs and Coordination, review by the Fifth Committee of the General Assembly, and then by the Plenary.

At the very beginning of this administration's term, in April 1981, we secured the agreement of the so-called Geneva Group, that is, Western-oriented donors contributing 10 percent or more to the budgets of the specialized agencies, that for the first half of the 1980's, real budgetary growth should be zero, with the understanding that some of the cost increases due to inflation and exchange rate losses would have to be absorbed. [37]

We collaborated as well with the U.S.S.R. which shares our concern with controlling costs. Demarches were made to the heads of the major U.N. agencies, stressing that priorities must be established and that marginal or obsolete programs must be terminated.

At the 37th General Assembly, we confronted head on the problem of add-ons. We, the United States, demanded a vote wherever and whenever a financial resolution had financial implications and voted against all resolutions and decisions which increased the U.N. budget without offsetting economies, unless there was some compelling political, humanitarian, or fiscal reason to the contrary.

There is not much doubt our campaign encouraged more attention to priorities and gave added urgency to the determination of Secretary General Perez de Cuellar to control too rapid budget growth.

In sending out his guidelines for the 1984–85 biennium, the Secretary General stressed that maximum fiscal restraint was required of all elements. [38]

Continued

All submissions of the several U.N. departments and agencies are now examined by a Program Planning and Budgeting Board, of which Perez himself is the Chairman.

The new Board also monitors and evaluates the functioning of the Secretariat itself.

I may say that I regard this move by the Secretary General as a very important and promising one.

In addition, in August Secretary General Perez de Cuellar commissioned a separate study of the Secretariat, its management systems and techniques, and such questions as staffing pattern, simplification of procedures, delegation of authority, and so forth.

The report is due early in 1984. [39]

The Secretary General and his principal associates have written to assure me he will undertake special measures and studies to streamline, modernize, and reduce costs in areas of U.N. functioning, such as travel, telecommunications, and the preparation and production of documents.

He is determined, he assures me, to bring under control the portions of the budget susceptible to his control.

I have included in an appendix a memorandum which the Secretariat provided to me on measures which they have taken, since the tenure of the new Secretary General began in January 1982, to enhance the efficiency of the United Nations. [40]

In the last fiscal year, neither our efforts nor those of all those with whom we work, including the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union, Japan, West Germany, and Israel and the Solomon Islands, and so forth, none of us voted for the budget.

The final vote was 120 for the budget, 15 opposed, and 6 abstentions.

Taken together, the 120 nations who voted for the budget probably contribute no more than 15 to 20 percent, or less than that, of the total assessed budget.

There is no escaping the fact that our efforts have not been successful.

Nor is there any escaping the fact that salaries and fringe benefits of U.N. employees are high compared to those of United States and other governments and continue to rise; that conferences proliferate, and costs continue to increase.

We cannot guarantee either that the efforts of the Secretariat or of the United States and the other nations that share our concern will achieve the desired results because effective control over the budget is vested in and exercised by a solid majority whose members, 88 countries, pay less than 2 percent of the budget.

The result last year is typical. Not 1 of the top 10 contributing countries—whose combined contributions pay some 75 percent of the U.N. expenses—voted for the budget.

Either they voted against or they abstained. Obviously they were dissatisfied.

Fourteen of the top 15 contributors whose combined contributions comprise some 85 percent of the budget either voted against or abstained.

What can the U.S. Congress do in this situation to control the costs to us, and to insure that international organizations which we help finance, operate on a basis of responsible budgetary restraint?

I believe this question is important and urgent. The initiative of Senator Kassebaum and her colleagues offers one approach to this question.

In discussing the question and possible approaches to it, I desire to make three points:

First the U.S. Government has total control over its voluntary contributions to the U.N. specialized agencies. Those voluntary contributions exceed the assessed contributions.

Second, although this is a controversial subject, I desire to make clear that I do not believe the U.S. treaty obligation to contribute 25 percent of the assessed budget is absolute.

summarized some of the points from the guidelines in his foreword to Proposed Program Budget for the Biennium 1984–1985. For text, see volume I of U.N. document A/38/6.

[39] The report on the U.N. Secretariat was not issued at the time of publication.

[40] For text, see The U.S. Role in the United Nations, p. 60.

It is sometimes argued that as signatories to the treaty, we assume an absolute legal obligation to pay the assessed share of the budget; it seems to me, after consultation and reflection, that this obligation is real, substantial, and serious, but also that it is not absolute.

It exists as part of a web of obligations, some of which are vested in other members, and some in the organization. It is integrally linked to understandings about the functions of this organization and the purposes to which the contributions will be devoted.

Moreover, 30 countries withhold, as a matter of announced policy, portions of their assessed budgets and incur no penalties. I have included an appendix which states the estimated cumulative withholding by U.N. member states as a matter of announced policy. [41]

I do not suggest the United States should take lightly the obligation to pay its assessed share of the budget. This is a serious, but not, in my opinion, an absolute obligation. To be sure, Article 17 of the U.N. Charter requires member states to pay their share of the U.N. budget as assessed by the General Assembly. We should not assume, however, that any expense apportioned by the General Assembly is automatically valid.

To create collective obligations to pay, the expense must be legitimate.

As you know, Congress has for a number of years required that the United States withhold the pro rata share of its assessed and voluntary contributions which go either to the two U.N. committees on Palestinian rights or which go to support U.N. activities on behalf of the P.L.O., Cuba, or SWAPO.

In each of these instances, we have deemed the activities of these entities to be in contravention of the basic principles and purposes of the U.N. Charter and, accordingly, have withheld payment.

For related reasons, President Reagan announced last year that the United States would withhold from its assessed U.N. contribution our share of the expenses associated with implementation of the Law of the Sea Treaty, which we determined to not properly be subject to assessment. [42]

As I have already said, 30 countries already withhold parts of their U.N. assessments for activities they deem improper. The largest withholding by far has occurred by the Soviet bloc states which have withheld more than $260 million.

Almost all of this withholding has been from U.N. peacekeeping operations. This withholding has been determined by the International Court of Justice, in the Certain Expenses case of 1962, [43] to be in clear contravention of the U.N. Charter since peacekeeping operations are an essential and thus permissible U.N. activity tied to the U.N. primary purpose of maintaining international peace and security.

This is in marked contrast to the withholding patterns of other states, including the U.S., where the legitimacy of the activity not supported is open to serious question and where no adverse ICJ ruling exists.

In this context, U.S. withholding in protest would not constitute a deviation from our traditional support for the principles of collective financial responsibility for legitimate U.N. expenses. Nor does such limited selective withholding damage the fiscal order of the U.N. by encouraging other nations to engage in selective withholding. They already are doing that and began long before the U.S., pursuant to congressional directives, started to engage in this practice.

Because withholding for legitimate U.N. expenses had by 1965 become a way of life for the Soviet bloc, the U.S. at that time announced, with the full knowledge and acquiescence of Congress, what has come to be known as the Goldberg Reservation. [44]

[44] Reference is to an August 16, 1965, statement made by the Representative at the United Nations, Arthur J. Goldberg, in the Special Committee of the U.N. General Assembly on Peacekeeping Operations. For text, see Department of State Bulletin, September 13, 1965, pp. 454–457.

That declaration reserves for the U.S. the right to follow the practices of others in selective withholding.

As stated by Ambassador Goldberg in 1965:

"... if any member can insist on making an exception to the principle of collective financial responsibility with respect to certain activities of the organization, the U.S. reserves the same option to make exceptions to the principles of collective financial responsibility if, in our view, strong and compelling reasons exist for doing so. There can be no double standard among the members of the organization."

Justice Goldberg, in response to a recent inquiry from me—at the time, the Law of the Sea Preparatory Conference was under consideration—wrote that it was his considered conclusion that:

"... there can be no question that under the Goldberg Reservation the U.S. reserves the right to withhold assessments for U.N. activities which, in our opinion, do not serve our national purpose."

I may say that is a Goldberg corollary, not a Kirkpatrick corollary.

The third point I would like to make. I would encourage the Congress, in its desire to exercise greater control over U.S. contributions and expenditures, to distinguish between U.N. operations and programs which U.S. taxpayers support and those they do not.

We should set priorities and make choices in ways that favor programs which are consistent with our values, and that favor agencies which pursue the purposes for which they were established.

We should penalize those which, because of politicization and/or inefficiency, have strayed from their legitimate purposes and tasks.

We might, for example, reasonably decide to register firmly through fiscal means, our profound disapproval of UNESCO, which has succumbed to politicization, which creates obstacles to a free press instead of promoting free exchange of information, discriminates against one of its members, Israel, and which is utterly indifferent to principles of fiscal restraint and good management.

It seems to me to be undesirable to impose identical cuts on the Secretariat as a whole when the Secretary General has undertaken a major effort to bring expenses under control and to enhance efficiency, or on the World Health Organization, which practices sound management and whose ongoing contributions to eradicating disease are well known.

In thinking about cuts, we should also distinguish between discretionary items in the assessed budget, such as the number of employees and their salary levels, and nondiscretionary items such as peacekeeping activities.

While we might want to reduce, perhaps even drastically reduce or eliminate entirely, our contributions to one agency, we might well want to expand the other.

Congress oversight responsibilities vis-à-vis U.S. funding of the U.N. requires constant vigilance of all U.N. activities, whether funded through our assessed or voluntary contributions, to determine their compatibility with the fundamental objectives and principles of the U.N. Charter.

Let me say that this administration's commitment to working inside the U.N. to achieve those fundamental objectives and principles of the U.N. Charter has been repeatedly reaffirmed.

However, since our voluntary contributions exceed our assessed contributions and as there are no binding restraints regarding such contributions, I recommend that if Congress is concerned principally about economy, it makes sense to start there, and afterward to move agency by agency through the assessed contributions.

In this regard I would like to respectfully suggest to this committee, as I have done in the past in testimony before other congressional committees, that the U.S. consider adopting the practice of many other large voluntary contributors of earmarking our funds to specific agencies and for specific projects.

Thus we would reward the specialized agencies which do work of which we approve and discontinue or reduce our funding of agencies which engage in practices we do not endorse.

In conclusion, I want to stress how deeply I believe in the importance of closer congressional oversight. By working cooperatively together, I think we both can better fulfill our own responsibilities.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. [45]

Israel's Right To Participate in the United Nations

Finally, a statement on the possibility of a challenge to Israeli credentials at the United Nations. The Credentials Committee of the U.N. General Assembly makes its report to the Assembly tomorrow. [47] Last year, a challenge was made to Israel's credentials. We do not yet know whether any delegation will attempt similar action tomorrow, but if this occurs, the United States will oppose it with all available diplomatic resources.

The United States has always made clear that any attack on Israel's right to participate in any United Nations organization, if successful, would have grave consequences for our own continued participation and support.

As Secretary Shultz stated on October 16, 1982, [48] if Israel were excluded from the General Assembly, the United States would withdraw from participation in the General Assembly and would withhold payments to the United Nations until Israel's right to participate was restored.

This policy reflects the strong sentiment of all elements of the U.S. Government, and the Congress expressed the same sentiment in a concurrent resolution last December. [49]

Letter From the Secretary of State (Shultz) to the Director General of the U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (M'Bow), December 28, 1983 [50]

U.S. Intentions To Withdraw From UNESCO

DEAR MR. DIRECTOR GENERAL: The purpose of this letter is to notify you, in accordance with Article II, paragraph 6 of the Constitution, that the United States will withdraw from the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization effective December 31, 1984.

You may be assured that the United States will seek to meet fully all of its legitimate financial obligations to the Organization on the date its withdrawal takes effect.

The Government of the United States, along with the American people generally, believe in the principles enunciated in the Constitution of UNESCO. Today, as in the early years of the Organization, these principles summon us to a commitment of effort—and resources—in the interest of building a stable and enduring framework for peace in the world. Today, as in the early years, we believe that education, science, culture and communication are essential elements in building a peaceful world.

While the United States continues to devote substantial resources to the attainment of these goals, it must choose carefully the precise methods and means through which these resources are to be used. There are many groups and organizations whose purposes we approve, but which are not effective at carrying out the kind of international cooperation that will contribute to the making of a peaceful world.

For a number of years, as you know from statements we have made at the Executive Board and elsewhere, we have been concerned that trends in the policy, ideological emphasis, budget and management of UNESCO were detracting from the Organization's effectiveness. We believe these trends have led UNESCO away from the original principles of its constitution. We feel that they have served the political purposes of member states, rather than the international vocation of UNESCO. We have worked energetically to encourage the Organization to reverse these trends; to redirect itself to its founding purposes; to rigorously avoid becoming a servant of one or another national policy; and to manage itself in a way that rewarded efficiency, promoted fearless program evaluation, and followed priorities based on program value rather than on past habit, political expediency, or some other extraneous consideration.

Many of these efforts, yours and ours, have been productive, at least in relative terms. The results of the recent General Conference prove the point, and we appreciate the role you played in the outcome of that Conference.[51]

Viewed in a larger sense, however, the General Conference proves a different point: if the results of the conference demonstrate the best that can be expected from the Organization as it is presently constituted, and as it presently governs itself, there can be little hope for a genuine and wholehearted return of the Organization to its founding principle.

For the United States, that conclusion has become inescapable. The responsibility to act upon it is equally inescapable.

You, Mr. Director General, have our esteem, our appreciation, and our pledge of the fullest cooperation to make the year intervening between this letter and the date of our withdrawal as harmonious as possible. We recognize that you will continue to do your best, in the difficult circumstances in which you operate, to make UNESCO activities productive and relevant to the unmet needs of the world.

For our part, we are convinced that we can develop other means of cooperation in education, science, culture and communication, which will more clearly embody the principles to which we subscribed in UNESCO many years ago. We are convinced that such cooperation need not be diminished by the injection of political goals beyond the scope of the cooperative enterprise, and that its authority need not be weakened through the compromise of such goals as individual human rights and the free flow of information. It may yet be appreciated that our shared aims could have been accomplished through attention to the principle that a few things done well have more impact than a superficial examination of all the world's ills.

We plan to use the resources we presently devote to UNESCO to support such other means of cooperation. Any alternative programs which the U.S. develops could, in principle, serve as a basis for future cooperation between the U.S. and UNESCO, should both parties find that advantageous. We would be pleased to consider that possibility at the appropriate time.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ

"Our Withdrawal From UNESCO Does Not Presage Any Wider Disengagement From the United Nations or Its Other Specialized Agencies"

DEAR MR. SECRETARY GENERAL: We are delivering to the Director General of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization a letter giving notice that the United States will withdraw from the organization, effective December 31, 1984. [53]

While the decision to withdraw from UNESCO is firm, we will remain a full member during 1984, paying our financial obligations. This year will give UNESCO a potential opportunity to respond to the serious concerns that have caused our withdrawal. We remain open to indications of significant improvement. We would, of course, welcome meaningful changes that would eliminate the suppression of minority views within UNESCO, and restore fiscal integrity to the organization.

We wish you to understand that our withdrawal from UNESCO does not presage any wider disengagement from the United Nations or its other specialized agencies. On the contrary, as President Reagan made clear at the General Assembly last September, [54] the United States is deeply attached to the principle that genuine international cooperation is essential to our shared purposes in the world, and to the attainment of peaceful progress for all.

As you are aware, the United States has been concerned for many years over a growing tendency on the part of UNESCO to depart from the principles upon which it was founded, and the purposes which it was originally called upon to fulfill. For several years, we have been working actively with other countries to reverse this unacceptable trend. Some progress has been made toward this end, but we have concluded, with regret, that under present circumstances we can no longer justify continuing United States membership in UNESCO.

For our part, we are convinced that we can develop other means of cooperation in education, science and culture and communication, which will more clearly embody the principles to which we subscribed in UNESCO many years ago. We plan to use the resources we presently devote to UNESCO to support such other means of cooperation.

In all your activity to promote the cause of international cooperation, we wish you well.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ

Statement by the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (Beggs) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 22, 1983 [1]

U.S. Accomplishments at UNISPACE 1982

Mr. Chairman, members of the subcommittee, it is a pleasure to appear today to testify about the participation of the United States at the Second United Nations Conference on the Exploration and Peaceful Uses of Outer Space, or UNISPACE 1982, as submitted to the Secretary of State on September 30, 1982; [2] the opening statement of the U.S. delegation before UNISPACE; [3] and a U.N. document describing the initiatives announced by the United States during the conference. [4] In addition to these documents, my testimony before this subcommittee on July 28, 1982, included a detailed description of the U.S. preparations for UNISPACE. [5]

I will not try to provide an exhaustive summary of the background of the Conference and the results of the U.S. participation at UNISPACE, as this is already described in several documents which I am providing for the record. These include the final U.S. delegation report.

Today, I will focus my remarks on some aspects of our participation which I thought would be of particular interest to this subcommittee. These aspects include the nature of U.S. Government and private industry cooperation relating to UNISPACE, a report on the status of some of the U.S. initiatives announced at the Conference, and my impressions about some of the less visible aspects of U.S. participation in such major international conferences as UNISPACE. As one of the themes of today's hearings is international communications, I will begin my testimony by briefly reviewing the outcome of some of the debates on space communications issues which took place at UNISPACE.

Throughout our preparations, we were in close contact with officials in several Government agencies who were working on preparations for forthcoming meetings of the International Telecommunication Union [ITU]. [6] An effort was made to discuss both organizational questions as well as substantive issues to insure consistency and strength in U.S. positions. Ambassador Gardner and I met prior to UNISPACE to exchange views, and he was able to spend 3 days at UNISPACE in order to observe the work of the U.S. delegation and to establish contacts with foreign delegates.

The future use of the geostationary orbit and the radio frequency spectrum for space communications was one of the major issues at UNISPACE. This issue is of great importance to the United States because of the technical and economic interests involved. The debate on this issue revolved around language in the final conference report relating to the efficient use of the geostationary orbit. Both prior to and during UNISPACE, many developing countries repeated their demands that their interests relating to the geostationary orbit and radio frequency spectrum should be specially provided for through the regulations of the radio spectrum and the allocation of slots through a priori planning. A few countries even reasserted claims of sovereignty over portions of the orbit. It was clear during the preparatory process and at the conference that some countries viewed UNISPACE as an opportunity to provide radical positions on some issues which would be taken up later at decisionmaking conferences of the ITU or other international organizations.

The United States strongly resisted efforts to prejudge consideration of telecommunications issues which are more properly considered at conferences of the ITU, in particular, the plenipotentiary, the 1983 Regional Administrative Radio Conference on Direct Broadcast Satellites in Region 2, and the World Administrative Radio Conference on Space to be held in 1985 and 1987. While supporting access by all countries to the geostationary orbit and radio frequency spectrum and encouraging attention by the international community to the future needs of developing countries in the use of these resources, we rejected the claims of sovereignty and the idea of a priori regulation as a counterproductive and, in many respects, discriminatory approach to utilizing the orbit and spectrum resources. We focused our presentations on describing the potential of technological advances in helping to alleviate concerns about crowding in the frequency spectrum, and reiterated our support for rational management of these resources as opposed to inflexible planning.

In the months preceding the Conference, the United States, through its diplomatic posts overseas, held an extensive series of bilateral consultations with many countries to explain our positions on all of the issues, including those relating to space communications. In our national paper, our statements during the Conference and through our national exhibition and demonstrations, we emphasized that advances in technology and vigorous research and development programs were leading to dramatic improvements in space communications. We also stressed that continued advances unconstrained by rigid international regulations would provide the most promise for greater access by all countries to valuable communications resources. In response to a suggestion by Congressman Brown during the July 28 hearings, a slide show on the keys to growth in communication satellite technology was prepared by NASA especially for UNISPACE, and was shown to selected delegates throughout the Conference. It was also used during the plenipotentiary.

Mr. Chairman, after arduous debate in formal committee sessions and many hallway discussions, consensus was reached on language in the Conference report which was compatible with vital U.S. technical and economic interests while acknowledging the special concerns of many developing countries about their future access to the radio frequency spectrum and the geostationary orbit. The debate at UNISPACE makes it clear, however, that demands for regulation of these resources are here to stay and will be presented at upcoming ITU conferences where important decisions regarding the future of space communications will be made. However, I believe Ambassador Gardner, who ably represented the United States at the ITU plenipotentiary, is in a better position than I to speak to this important question.

I would like to turn to the subject of U.S. Government and private industry cooperation in respect to UNISPACE. This is an area that should be highlighted because it was a unique and, in some respects, an experimental aspect of U.S. participation at the Conference. Although this was not a complete success story, as many of the industry representatives became involved late in the preparatory process, the presence on the U.S. delegation of eight top level executives from U.S. industry combined with prominent officials from Congress, the executive branch and academia contributed to an outstanding delegation representing a cross-section of persons involved in space activities. The involvement of representatives from many of our largest aerospace firms at a time of growing international competition exemplified the strong relationship of industry and Government in the U.S. civil space program. At UNISPACE, these individuals provided valuable counsel to the other delegates and availed themselves of the opportunity to interact and establish contacts with decisionmakers from around the world.

The leading role of the U.S. industry in space was also demonstrated in the outstanding Government/industry technological exhibition at UNISPACE. This impressive display, which would not have been possible without the enthusiastic participation of 11 private companies and several Government agencies, attracted nearly 200,000 visitors during the 2 weeks it was open, and was judged by many to have been the best among the 25 exhibitions staged. A high quality exhibition was a vital element of our overall presence at UNISPACE because, as anticipated, the Europeans and the U.S.S.R. staged impressive technological exhibitions as well.

In addition to the national exhibition, industry and Government worked together in support of a series of technological demonstrations staged for UNISPACE. Through the auspices of the Communications Satellite Corp., the United Nations was able to establish a dedicated satellite communications link between the Conference site and U.N. Headquarters in New York City. This link was used successfully to demonstrate remote interpretation services and remote translation of Conference documents. Another demonstration which received much positive attention was a display of communication peripheral equipment in a demonstration of the U.S. Agency for International Development's rural satellite program, which aims to demonstrate the use of satellite communications in remote areas of developing countries. The demonstration would not have been possible without the support of private companies which contributed personnel and hardware.

Much was learned from this experience in Government/industry cooperation at UNISPACE. The great lesson may be that we are underestimating the importance which industry may attach to such conferences as UNISPACE and the amount of support they are willing to provide in insuring that the United States represents itself appropriately, and thereby protects interests vital to both the public and private sectors.

In discussing the U.S. initiatives, I should begin by noting that out of the some 94 delegations represented at the Conference, the United States was the only one to propose a series of specific initiatives formulated to assist developing countries to benefit from the practical applications of outer space technology.

I would like to briefly report on the status of several of these initiatives. For a detailed description of all eight initiatives, please refer to the document on the matter which I have submitted for the record.

At UNISPACE, I announced that the United States would be discussing a global habitability concept with other Governments and international institutions in the months ahead. Global habitability is a research concept to investigate long-term physical, chemical, and biological trends and changes in the Earth's environment, including its atmosphere, land masses, and oceans. A global habitability program approach is currently under study within NASA. To assist in this effort, NASA has enlisted the aid of a number of scientists from the university community and from other research agencies. NASA is beginning discussions with several U.S. Government agencies with a view to exploring the means of coordinating research efforts that will effectively utilize the U.S. global space capability. Following this coordination, we will be in a position to discuss our proposed efforts with prospective foreign and international agency partners. In the latter regard, I should point out the already extensive ongoing international bilateral involvement that the United States has with other countries in Earth science research areas.

In the area of using space technology for disaster relief, planning is beginning for a 5-day international conference in the spring of 1984 on the application of space technologies for disaster monitoring and early warning. This Conference, which will be sponsored by the U.S. AID Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance, will consider how satellite-based data and communication systems can be of assistance in such areas as global drought assessment, and providing early warnings of famine and severe storms. Current operational systems, systems under development and future applicable technologies would be examined.

To assist countries in the area of land remote sensing, the United States presented Landsat data indexes to each country in attendance at UNISPACE. These indexes, which were produced especially for UNISPACE, contain listings of the highest quality available data collected by Landsats 1, 2, and 3 during their 10 years of operation and are referenced to the new worldwide reference system maps developed by the U.S. Geological Survey. We hope that these indexes will be useful in helping countries take full advantage of the vast holdings of the EROS Data Center. The United States also distributed copies of the first image developed using data from the thematic mapper aboard the Landsat 4 satellite which was launched just prior to UNISPACE. In addition, a special lecture on Landsat 4 was given during the Conference. Great interest was expressed in the future uses of thematic mapper data, the quality of which has already far exceeded our expectations, and we look forward to the use of this data by many countries.

On February 4–5, 1983, NASA and Columbia University sponsored the first intergovernmental meeting of space technology experts on the Columbia University campus in New York City. The purpose of this meeting, which was announced during UNISPACE, was to provide a forum where senior governmental officials involved in space programs, from both developed and developing countries, could exchange information on recent developments and future plans in space science, Earth sciences, land remote sensing, satellite communications, and cooperative opportunities for developing countries. Presentations were given by 39 prominent experts in these fields from around the world. The meeting was attended by nearly 100 representatives from some 40 countries and international organizations.

The results of this meeting were very encouraging as the feedback received from many of the participants has been quite positive. I believe that we will continue to have such meetings of space technology experts, perhaps on an annual basis.

Although it may not always be in our interest to develop initiatives for every international conference we attend, our positive experience thus far with the initiatives developed for UNISPACE indicates that it is important to at least consider initiatives when preparing for any conference at which U.S. interests might be at stake. Because initiatives usually involve budgetary implications, the process of considering initiatives should begin well in advance of the actual conference. Concern about budgetary constraints, however, should not be allowed to hamper the creative thought process as constructive initiatives may be possible with relatively small amounts of money. I think our experience with the Landsat Data Indexes and the Columbia University meeting bears this out. The area of communications could be particularly fruitful for U.S. initiatives as evidenced by the tremendous interest among developing countries and the impressive response to such recent initiatives as the Telecommunications Training Institute developed by Ambassador Gardner for the Plenipotentiary.

In addition to the U.S. initiatives, formal work on implementing the recommendations of the Conference is taking place in the U.N. Outer Space Committee.

Before closing, I would like to share my views with you on another aspect of international conferences such as UNISPACE which is often overlooked. It seems that international conferences, particularly those sponsored by the United Nations, are usually rather unwieldy undertakings, characterized by political posturing and stylized debate and rhetoric. Progress on issues is often slow, and U.N. conferences often appear to be threatening to U.S. interests and short on substantive results. It is nonetheless clear that a strong and positive U.S. presence at international gatherings such as UNISPACE is vital. This participation also is an opportunity to meet both formally and informally with decisionmakers from around the world. Not only are personal relationships established and improved, but frank and informal discussions of mutual problems in relations and opportunities for cooperation are possible. At UNISPACE, members of this U.S. delegation and I benefited greatly from the tremendous amount of face-to-face communication at very senior levels which was able to take place. I personally engaged in a number of bilateral discussions with my counterparts from other countries and international organizations. I believe the fruits of these contacts will be evident in NASA's future cooperative programs.

In closing, I would like to state my firm conviction that the United States accomplished its objectives at UNISPACE. These were to demonstrate U.S. leadership in the peaceful uses of outer space, emphasize the openness of our programs to international cooperation, underscore U.S. leadership in developing space technology of practical benefit to all people, and confirm our willingness to share these benefits with the world community.

Many contentious issues remain, but the experience at UNISPACE where the 94 countries attending were able to reach consensus on a document containing over 400 paragraphs covering the breadth and depth of mankinds' activities in outer space shows that we can be a full and positive participant without adversely affecting our interests.

Finally, I would like to refer to the just completed Office of Technology Assessment report on UNISPACE. I have only had a brief opportunity to review it. My overall impression is that it makes some valuable points. Assessments of this nature can provide useful insights to help guide the Government toward improving its participation in international conferences.

Address by the Administrator of the Agency for International Development (McPherson) Before the World Wildlife Fund, March 7, 1983 [7]

U.S. Commitment to Conservation and the Role of the Environmental Community

Good evening. Tonight, there are two messages I want to bring you.

First, the environmental issues are important to me and have been given considerable emphasis and visibility within AID. We have put substantial resources into environmentally-related programs and will continue to do so in the future.

And, secondly, I would like to see the environmental community become one of AID's constituencies—and I am going to do my best to convince you of our sincere interest tonight.

We need your ideas on the kinds of programs we should be initiating and I look forward to your ideas.

Our program which provides environmental-related assistance to others really only began a few years ago. Since then the assistance level has risen to approximately $125 million a year, a significant amount indeed. With the increased emphasis I have in mind this number may increase.

This $125 million generally covers four areas relating to environmental issues: institution building, education, conservation and land management, and reforestation and fuelwood programs. Other activities of some size are in the area of water and wastewater, conservation of agricultural waters, and environmental health. Our environmental policy is tied to achievement of other objectives, such as energy and pesticides.

But one of the biggest areas of growth in our environmental activities over the last few years has been strengthening institutions. This key element is helping developing countries to better understand and to manage their own environment. Environmental assessments are part of this institution-building process:

—The best known assessment project is that of the Mahaweli Basin in Sri Lanka where we were asked to carry out the assessment for the entire basin development. This was done by the engineering firms of TAMS. It will be an important part of an environmentally sound plan.

—A similar assessment is being undertaken in the Gambia River Basin development which includes a low head dam, funded by others, which will bring about the loss of some 30,000 acres of mangroves. The assessment is being carried out by Michigan State University's Center for Research in Economic Development.

—In Peru, we carried out a more quickly prepared environmental assessment in the Pichis Palcazu in the high jungle area which the government wished to develop for agriculture.

I'm sure that most of you were aware of Dr. Gentry's work before the January issue of the National Geographic Magazine, which introduced his work to the general public. What you may not have known about is that AID was funding some of his valuable work. We are currently funding some investigations in the high jungle of Peru by Dr. Alwyn Gentry of the Missouri Botanical Gardens to identify and collect species.

---

[7] Source: Department of State files. McPherson addressed the group in Washington.

Dr. Gentry has identified a vine whose seeds, when dry, burn with a clear blue flame and could possibly be a substitute for kerosene or charcoal. In the Huallaga Valley in Peru, Dr. Gentry has also located an isolated population of a tree species whose bark is regarded as a possible cure for cancer. The chemical makeup of this bark is under study at the University of Illinois. In addition we have helped the World Wildlife Fund conduct research in Brazil.

Environmental profiles and national conserva[illegible] strategies are two vehicles through which AID has supported the efforts of host governments, the United Nations and Natural Resources, and the International Union for Conservation of Nature to identify the nature of environmental problems country-by-country. As individual proposals are developed by or presented to AID's Bureau for Science and Technology, we intend to do more data collection and analysis. Before we can reach the stage of environmental prescriptions, we need to have a proper diagnosis of the problems country-by-country.

For most LDCs were are [sic] still in the first stage. The success of their overall, long-term development will be impacted by how well we assist them in anticipating problems or correcting old ones. I hope that a little AID "seed" money can help the environmental nongovernmental organizations establish themselves as a valuable asset to their country as we have done in Ecuador and Costa Rica.

In the past we have relied on commercial consulting firms to provide regional assessments. In the future we expect to make greater use of nongovernmental organizations. Organizations such as the World Wildlife Fund should be able—for far less money—to do the work which AID has traditionally contracted out.

Several things we are doing are probably of interest to you.

First, and foremost was the distribution of a revised Policy Determination on environment and natural resources that replaces the current one prepared in 1965. It has been circulated to key people outside of AID for comment. I know some of you have reviewed it for us. The initial comments we have received are valuable and appreciated. AID cannot walk in isolation; we must move ahead together.

This Policy Determination has been widely circulated so everyone can see the range of programs we support and advocate in the environment area. It is still not too late for any of you to review it in its draft stage, if you have not seen it yet. We need your comments to strengthen our environmental planning strategies, which will provide our AID missions with guidance on how to proceed.

AID remains the only bilateral agency to adopt a formal procedure for ensuring environmental sustainability of its development.

It should not be surprising that I am urging Multilateral Banks to have a more effective environmental component to their programs. The Inter-American Development Bank, for example, prepared some program guidance a year or so ago and retained an ecologist, otherwise their progress has been disappointing. However, only the Asian Development Bank has thus far set up a central staff with the ability to review proposed projects for environmental soundness.

I understand the African Development Bank will now set up a staff with Swedish funding. This is an area where more work is needed and you can be assured of my commitment for AID to play a key role in this regard.

In my capacity as acting director of IDCA and with close consultations with my colleagues in the Treasury, I anticipate that AID will enter into an effective dialogue with the banks and their staffs on environmental issues. We also expect that our bilateral talks with the Japanese will focus on the manner in which we each undertake a review of the environmental aspects of joint projects. Likewise, I hope we can begin a dialogue with other national donor organizations on the subject of environmental programs. We are already working through DAC in Paris on this effort.

A linkage between AID and some environmental groups must be pursued. On the 15th of February, I signed an agreement formalizing an arrangement between AID and the World Environment Center. It provides corporate technical expertise to industries in the Near East on handling their environmental issues, through a joint program between the World Environment Center, AID and 14 participating corporations. This program which grew out of our discussions with industry has now been tested in Tunisia at three facilities.

Under this type of arrangement, AID picks up travel per diem and support costs. But salaries are paid by the participating corporation. I fully expect that we will be able to expand this type of an operation to cover other areas as well. My goal is to draw upon the valuable expertise that exists in corporate America. This will greatly enhance their image in the LDCs, as people in the LDCs are as proud and protective of their land as we are of ours.

From a philosophical point of view the relationship with the World Environment Center illustrates the kind of voluntarism projects the President has been encouraging. Some of you may have been waiting in the wings for a program to participate in. This may be just the thing. I think these are the kind of projects many of you here would be interested in having your company participate in. Let me encourage you to put forth your ideas. I would really like to hear from you.

We are trying to find an effective role for U.S. manufacturers of pesticides to see that their products are properly distributed, used, monitored, and disposed of in the developing countries. We expect a workshop we are organizing that will include industry, environmental and donor organizations will lead in that direction.

AID's traditional activities have played an important role and will continue to do so. But we need to rethink and take advantage of the opportunities in areas such as watershed protection through the establishment of forest reserves and reforestation. The National Geographic article I mentioned earlier delineates:

—those countries where the rain forests have not been touched and can be protected,

—those countries where they are being explored and developed,

—those countries where there is large scale depletion underway,

—and those countries where we can only pick up the pieces and rebuild watershed areas.

We can do a better job at taking a more integrated natural resource approach to our traditional agricultural projects. Our reforestation project in Haiti, Nepal, and India are good examples of rebuilding the watersheds. We should be doing more in terms of support of species identification and protection, and our efforts with regard to integrated pest management in crop protection can be enhanced.

AID is supporting individual projects in the Caribbean as the U.S. contribution to UNEP's Caribbean Action Plan. The $600,000 I made available go for oil spill planning, watershed and wildlife management and environmental education. Incidentally, Joe Wheeler, my former Deputy Administrator has been selected as the Deputy to UNEP's Executive Director. I know Joe's dedication and what an excellent choice Dr. Tolba made. Joe is a close personal friend, as well as one of the most respected Foreign Service officers AID had. Our loss is their gain.

A great number of poor countries are coastal states, and in some like Indonesia and the Caribbean nations, we find the preservation of the marine environment is an important concern of the government. We do have specific projects that relate to either fisheries, reestablishment of sea grasses, mangrove evaluation, et cetera. This is also an area where an integrated approach is desirable. But it is an area of assistance that I expect to see grow more in terms of understanding than in terms of big dollar projects.

To sum up, there is much that needs to be done. And we are looking for ways to work with organizations like the World Wildlife Fund in a more extensive way. There is a lot that we can do to help one another. The Reagan administration is interested in expanding environmentally sound development, and the assessment of natural resources including wild fauna and flora. I hope that our meeting tonight will contribute to a positive dialogue between us and of action.

Policy Determination by the Administrator of the Agency for International Development (McPherson), April 26, 1983 [8]

AID Environmental Policy

ENVIRONMENTAL AND NATURAL RESOURCE ASPECTS OF DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE

I. Introduction

It is AID policy:

—To assist the less developed countries (LDCs): (1) in building the institutional and scientific capacity required for identifying, assessing and solving their critical environmental and natural resources problems; and (2) with establishing programs to address natural resource management problems.

—To ensure the environmental soundness and long term sustainability of AID assistance programs and projects.

—To promote environmentally sound development projects funded by multilateral and bilateral development assistance organizations.

This policy reflects AID's recognition that the achievement of long-term benefits to the world's poor, whether they be in urban or rural settings, must be based on environmentally sound planning and on a clear understanding of a country's natural resource potentials and limitations. The natural resources of LDCs are today subject to stresses of unprecedented magnitude. These pressures are brought about in large part by rapid population growth which results in increasing numbers of poor people struggling for food, fuel and other necessities of life. Because the health, nutrition, and general well-being of these people is directly dependent on the integrity and productivity of their natural resources, the capability of governments and of the people themselves to manage their resources effectively over the long term is of paramount importance. The effectiveness of the Agency's policy and strategy in support of family planning activities in developing countries is critical to the achievement of the Agency's goal in this area as well.

II. Setting

Developing country leaders and institutions are becoming increasingly aware that economic development must build upon a sound and sustainable natural resource base. Assistance in this and any other area, however is often a delicate task because of sensitivity to external efforts to influence their national development, differing priorities, stages of development and cultural, social and environmental values. Despite these potential constraints, provision of U.S. bilateral assistance involves decisions by AID which must be taken with full cognizance of all associated costs and benefits, including environmental considerations.

Quality-of-life improvements in the developing world can be realized and sustained only by acceptance of the principle that environmental planning must be an integral component of national development plans and programs. Fundamental is the recognition of the cross-cutting nature of environmental and natural resource concerns and a shared commitment by all Agency components to address these concerns in pursuing development goals. The continuing reduction of tropical forest cover, the exhaustion of crop lands, the decline and depletion of fisheries and wildlife, the advance of desert frontiers, the increasing conflicts over use of water, the adverse consequences of indiscriminate use of pesticides, and the lack of effective industrial and urban pollution control are problems that are synergistic and thus lead to multiple impacts on developing countries.

III. Policy Determination

Environmental Analysis Policy

Section 118 of the Foreign Assistance Act, requires AID to ensure the environmental soundness of its development programs through the preparation of environmental assessments of its major actions, whether effects are localized in an aid recipient country or extend to the United States or to the global environment. These assessments look at the long and short-term effects of AID activities on the people who are to benefit from the programs and are prepared, to the fullest extent possible, in cooperation with the host country. The current procedures followed in ensuring the environmental soundness of development assistance are found at 22 CFR Part 216. The procedures, updated from those issued in 1976, were adapted from improved regulations of the Council on Environmental Quality issued under the National Environmental Policy Act and Executive Order 12114, concerning the environmental effects abroad of major federal actions. The current procedures contain an appropriate level of flexibility in the environmental evaluation process and reduce the potential for delays in program approval. Eliminated from AID's requirement of environmental review are categories of projects with little or no likelihood of environmental impact. Conversely, projects which are most likely to result in significant adverse impact and which will always need further detailed environmental study are identified. For these latter activities, AID is committed to a process of working with the host country to define, at an early stage, the likely areas of significant adverse impact to be fully evaluated and mitigated to the extent possible during subsequent stages of project preparation. In assessing routine activities with predictable impacts or requiring a straightforward environmental review, AID will utilize a number of design criteria prepared for this purpose. To the extent practicable, AID will seek the participation of local or host government expertise in this process as a means of strengthening their capabilities.

[8] Source: Agency for International Development files. This was Policy Determination 6.

Environment and Natural Resource Initiatives

It is AID policy to assist countries to improve their national policies and strengthen their institutional and scientific capability through means such as the preparation of follow-on country environmental profiles and natural resource assessments intended to help with the understanding of natural resource constraints to development, national and regional training programs, and provision of technical assistance. It is AID policy to provide new environmental agencies with carefully targeted technical assistance for developing their own national environmental policies which will contribute to sustainable economic development.

AID will provide assistance to conservation groups in LDCs which have organized in response to the continued degradation of their country's environment and natural resources. These groups can carry out national awareness campaigns, establish local chapters, and sponsor various grass roots activities. By providing assistance to these and appropriate United States based organizations working in developing countries, AID can enhance their effectiveness in promoting public participation in the formulation of national environmental policy. Wherever appropriate, AID will attempt to influence national development policies or environmental legislation through its loan or grant programs.

It is also AID policy to assist governments in the examination and implementation, through projects, of alternative means of natural resource management. Many natural resource use practices and management systems which at one time may have been viable, have now become completely inoperative to the point of being destructive to the environment and sustainable development. Bio-physical and socio-economic circumstances, including population increases, evolve and change to the point that alternative natural resource use and management practices are essential for continued economic growth. AID will therefore offer assistance in overcoming practices which result in problems such as: desertification and range degradation; declining soil productivity; fuelwood shortages; and increases in environmental diseases such schistosomiasis, malaria, and trypanosomiasis due to alteration of habitats by human endeavor. These and similar problems can best be addressed through appropriate natural resource management. AID will give full consideration to programs such as, those addressing watershed protection, soil stabilization, social forestry, establishment or enhancement of natural areas or reserves, coastal zone management, and identification of plant and animal species in remote areas designated for development. AID will support research and the transfer of appropriate technologies which will contribute to the solution of these and other management issues including those of man made pollution.

Cooperation with International Bodies and Other Donors

AID is committed to working with other development agencies to seek consistency of policies and procedures which address the complex interactions in the management of environment and natural resources for sustainable economic growth. It is AID's policy to provide other donor or international organizations with examples of environmental activities and information such as environmental profiles, guidelines and environmental assessments. Emphasis will be placed on cooperating with international and regional organizations and other donors on training and the exchange of training materials and technical experts. Whenever AID is involved in multiple donor-financed projects, special efforts will be taken to ensure that responsibility for oversight of environmental concerns rests with a specific host-country technical organization, donor, or a joint technical committee. This will provide assurance that environmental concerns are addressed throughout project design and implementation stages and that all necessary monitoring and evaluation activities are properly included in project planning to optimally guide the development activity. Professional staff, trained in the environmental sciences, are located in select missions abroad to work closely with country officials and other donors in examining development problems from an environmental perspective and evaluating alternative means of achieving development goals.

Statement Issued by the Department of State, May 9, 1983 [9]

U.S. Arctic Policy

After review of a report by the Inter-Agency Arctic Policy Group (IAPG), [10] President Reagan has affirmed that the United States has unique and critical interests in the arctic region related directly to national defense, resource and energy development, scientific inquiry, and environmental protection.

In light of the region's growing importance, it warrants priority attention by the United States. U.S. arctic policy will continue to be based on the following major elements:

—protection of essential security interests in the arctic region, including preservation of the principle of freedom of the seas and superjacent airspace;

—support for sound and rational development in the arctic region, while minimizing adverse effects on the environment;

—promotion of scientific research in fields contributing to knowledge of the arctic environment or of aspects of science which are most advantageously studied in the Arctic; and —promotion of mutually beneficial international cooperation in the Arctic to achieve the above objectives.

The IAPG, reporting to the National Security Council, will be responsible for reviewing and coordinating implementation of this policy and U.S. international activities and programs in the Arctic. These responsibilities will not include purely domestic matters. In discharging its responsibilities, however, the IAPG will ensure close consultation with agencies concerned with those domestic matters.

The IAPG will give priority attention to the following reviews:

—How should U.S. activities in the arctic region be coordinated with those of other countries bordering on the Arctic Ocean to serve best U.S. arctic interests? This will include consideration of possible actions for increased cooperation.

—What federal services may be necessary for the United States to provide in the arctic region over the next decade and what are their relative priorities? This will take into account projected developments in the Arctic that could have an important impact upon federal agencies with statutory responsibility for areas such as search and rescue; protecting life, property, resources and wildlife; enforcing U.S. laws and international treaties; and promoting commerce. This review will also recognize that resource development is primarily a private sector activity.

Letter From President Reagan to the U.S. Senate, May 11, 1983 [11]

Eastern Pacific Ocean Tuna Fishing Agreement

TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES: I transmit herewith, for the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, the Eastern Pacific Ocean Tuna Fishing Agreement which has been signed by the United States, Costa Rica and Panama. It will enter into force following ratification by five coastal states of the region. Also transmitted for the information of the Senate is the report of the Department of State with respect to the Treaty.

The United States has been involved in a fisheries dispute with several Latin American countries as a result of conflicting laws regarding jurisdiction over highly migratory tuna and has, in the past, prohibited imports of tuna from several countries as a result of seizures of U.S. tuna boats. These countries claim jurisdiction over all fish, including tuna, within 200 nautical miles. The United States does not recognize, or claim, jurisdiction over tuna beyond 12 nautical miles. United States policy, pursuant to the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act, has been to negotiate international agreements to ensure the effective conservation and management of tuna and to secure access for U.S. fishermen to the stocks wherever they migrate beyond a narrow belt of coastal waters.

This Agreement, which is interim in nature pending the negotiation of a comprehensive tuna conservation and management regime, provides for the issuance of international licenses for fishing tuna in a broad area of the eastern Pacific Ocean. Provision is also made for conservation under specified circumstances. It thus furthers U.S. fisheries policy goals while reducing tensions that have arisen as a result of conflicting juridical claims.

I recommend that the Senate give early consideration to the Treaty and give its advice and consent to ratification.

Policy Determination by the Administrator of the Agency for International Development (McPherson), May 16, 1983 [12]

AID Forestry Policy

I. Introduction

Forests, woodlands and grasslands provide multiple uses and benefits to society. These natural, renewable resources provide food, storage, fuel, shelter, commercial products, as well as income and employment opportunities. These material benefits are critical in enabling rural populations in developing countries to meet a broad range of their basic needs. Forests also provide important environmental benefits and perform protective functions by regulating waterflow and preventing flooding; influence both the quality and quantity of usable water for agriculture, industry, livestock and human consumption; provide habitats for wildlife; preserve a vast genetic reservoir of plant and animal life; help minimize soil erosion and soil resource depletion; influence local climate and meteorological phenomena as well as stabilize the global climate; and, forests make recreational, education, industrial and scientific contributions to entire populations and their succeeding generations.

In many developing countries current rates of deforestation threaten the continued realization of these multiple benefits. Destructive and unsustainable levels of forest use must be replaced by those which can be sustained. Fuelwood needs and the expansion of agriculture into forest areas are currently responsible for a major part of forest depletion. Even now there are many people without sufficient fuelwood to meet their minimum cooking and heating needs. If current rates of deforestation continue unabated, some 250 million people will be affected by the year 2000. People will be forced to increase their use of animal dung and crop residues, thereby decreasing their crop yields and providing further impetus to extend cultivation into forest lands. Thus, the long term prospects for growth in agriculture are significantly threatened by the continued depletion of tropical forests. An allocation of development resources is needed that is both adequate and appropriate to address the deep-rooted causes of deforestation.

II. Setting

Within the context of broadly-based economic growth, AID endorses a policy for U.S. bilateral assistance which endeavors to support developing countries in their efforts to satisfy the basic human needs of their people. Major elements of this strategy include: (1) assisting the poor to increase their incomes—through raising their productivity, opportunity to acquire skills and expanding their opportunities for productive employment, and (2) increasing the availability of goods and services required to meet these basic needs.

In many developing countries unsustainable uses of forest resources are already having widespread adverse effects. Such effects are being felt by consumers who need fuelwood, farmers who require assured supplies of water for their crops and protection against erosion for their fields, builders who rely on timber, hillyland farmers who cultivate forest lands and lands marginal to intensive cultivation and workers who depend on jobs in forest-related industries for their livelihood.

In promoting more sustainable land use patterns, it is important to recognize the key role that forest land management plays in relation to environmental protection, especially on hilly-lands cultivated by people with little social, cultural and economic standing. Upstream watershed management that includes forest management techniques is crucial to sustainable patterns of land use, reliable water delivery for agricultural production, hydroelectric generation, and potable water supplies. Without directed action to alter the allocation of development resources to marginal as well as more productive areas, and to generate the knowledge needed to protect watersheds and maintain deforested lands in productive use, the prospects for sustained and efficient agricultural growth are likely to be significantly impaired. These constraints will undoubtedly have broad ecological, social and political ramifications, especially if corrective measures are not undertaken.

III. Policy Determination

A. Objective of AID Forestry Assistance

The broad objective of AID forestry assistance is to enable developing countries to manage their forests, woodlands, range and other wildland resources more efficiently for sustained increases in the production of forest products. AID forestry assistance should be based on a comprehensive plan for natural resource management, environmental protection and conservation. AID will encourage a policy environment in LDCs to stimulate the participation of people, their communities, organizations and enterprises in using their natural resources in productive and sustainable ways. AID assistance should, therefore, promote the most economically efficient and ecologically sound use of forest resources and products to help meet existing and future energy, food, wood, employment and commercial needs of developing countries.

B. Elements of Forestry Policy

To achieve the objectives of forestry assistance, AID will focus on four inter-related policy elements:

1. improve country policies to provide adequate incentives for people and private enterprise to participate in forestry activities and programs that will reverse deforestation;

2. develop human resources and organizational capabilities of existing forestry and related institutions, private and public, to effectively design, implement, and evaluate forestry policies and programs as well as comprehensive plans for natural resource management. The critical role of applied and adaptive research in the development and transfer of technologies for meeting fuelwood needs will be stressed;

3. expand the role of private enterprise—defined to include individuals, cooperatives, voluntary organizations and profit-seeking entities—as a means to establish an industrial base for forest development, improve the production efficiency of forests and promote the utilization efficiency in conversion and consumption of forest products.

4. employ all available assistance instruments in support of forestry assistance, including the use of P.L. 480 food aid, [13] in an integrated manner. In so doing, AID will coordinate assistance in other spheres—agriculture, energy, environment and the private sector—with forestry policy and programs. Also, AID will work closely with other donors, the U.N. specialized agencies, other U.S. Government agencies, private organizations in the U.S. and private voluntary organizations.

C. Policy Guidelines for Interventions from Private Organizations

1. Broad-based participation of prospective beneficiaries is essential for design and implementation of successful forestry assistance. Community and individual needs, interests and incentives to participate in forestry and related work will be important criteria for project selection. The roles of local organizations, particularly those that manage the allocation and use of land, will be given major weight in program development. Also important is the need for small and medium sized firms, trade associations, banks and cooperatives to become more involved in producing, marketing and processing wood and non-wood products of the forest.

2. AID will encourage measures to assess the degree to which public sector policies, regulations and programs encourage or discourage individual and/or private sector participation and resource mobilization in forestry interventions. Also, innovative ways to implement policy reforms will be stressed which encourage greater private sector participation.

3. AID will focus on programs which increase the efficiency of production, marketing and utilization enterprises including management and technical skills of the private sector in undertaking forestry activities.

4. AID will encourage greater access to markets, information, credit and requisite infrastructure to more effectively mobilize private and community resources for forestry development.

D. Policy Guidelines for Interventions of a Public Nature

1. AID will encourage dialogue, analyses and programs to improve country policies to provide incentives and remove constraints to infrastructural and institutional development, furtherance of local organizations and providing more broadly-based access to productive resources and services in forestry.

2. AID will give priority to complementary policies and programs that effectively interact and support the work and initiatives of local communities, voluntary organizations and private enterprise.

3. AID will assist public institutions in technology transfer, forestry education and to develop effective and efficient approaches to organize local initiatives in forestry and related work.

4. AID will promote efforts to elicit host country political and financial commitment to altering unsustainable forest resource use practices and, in turn, obtain similiar commitments from rural populations to participate in forestry work.

E. Implications for Program Development

Because of the diversity of problems, resources, awareness, and commitment among developing countries, this policy determination does not attempt to delineate precisely the types of programs which AID will support in all cases. AID recognizes that forestry is inherently a long term enterprise and that forestry interventions must be long range undertakings. Any one of several areas of activity may be an appropriate starting point for policy implementation and program development:

1. Analysis, planning, and policy formulation (including natural resource inventories, plans and land use assessments; land capability classification; evaluation of tenure law and its application);

2. Institution-building for natural resource management, conservation (including training, management systems, and establishment of service support institutions) and forestry education which emphasizes curriculum expansion to include substantial components in forest management, forest product management, logging engineering, wood technology, range and watershed management;

[13] Formally entitled the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act, enacted July 10, 1954; for text, see 68 Stat. 454.

3. Incorporation of forestry and agroforestry activities into agricultural and rural development programs;

4. Afforestation and reforestation, as well as management and protection of forest plantations and natural forest stands with special emphasis on ecologically suitable, fast-growing, multipurpose species;

5. Involvement of forestry institutions in energy planning and analysis of appropriate or alternative energy sources; and/or,

6. Action programs for technology transfer and exchange, including extension and community liaison.

IV. Implications for Other Types of Development Assistance

AID's forestry policy supports other types of development assistance and this policy determination should be read in conjunction with policy papers guiding assistance in other fields. In many cases, strengthening the support for forestry related activities will increase the potential for achieving objectives in other fields in which AID and other donors provide assistance. In other cases, there may be conflicting objectives and the trade-off between competing activities should be carefully evaluated in cost-benefit terms. In all cases the economic and earning potential of forestry should be recognized and policies and programs should be designed to attain this significant economic potential.

A. Environment and Natural Resources

The environmental influences of forestry development are fully reflected in AID's environmental and natural resource policies. Upland watersheds in forest cover assure water supplies, stabilize tropical soils and protect habitat for diverse flora and fauna. Shelterbelts, windbreaks and dune stabilization measures in semi-arid environments protect against wind erosion, wind stress, water loss and desert encroachment. Herbs, grasses, shrubs and trees found within grassland, savanna and rangeland provide vegetation complexes upon which environmental protection and natural resource conservation is based. AID will encourage LDCs to approach forest land conversion to permanent or shifting agriculture and livestock use in a manner that ensures sustainable production systems and the most appropriate land-use patterns in relation to soil characteristics and land capability analyses. Continued attention will be given in environmental, social and economic analysis to evaluate trade-offs among alternative land-use choices.

B. Agriculture and Rural Development

The provision of support for the development of agro-forestry programs and other alternatives to unsustainable patterns of shifting cultivation and intensive agriculture should help to encourage a sound balance between agriculture, range and livestock, and forest land uses in developing countries. By developing alternative fuel supplies, fuelwood programs should benefit agriculture by increasing the availability of dung and crop residue for soil enrichment. By developing forest-based income and employment opportunities, rural growth will be fostered.

C. Energy

The increased production of fuelwood supplies through the establishment of tree plantations, re-integration of forestry on farms through agro-forestry, fuelwood conservation through improved stoves and kilns as well as natural forest and scrubland management has already been adopted as objectives of AID's energy policy. Thus through direct production programs as well as through conservation of other energy sources (e.g., protection of watersheds above hydroelectric dams), forestry activities will play a key role in supporting the achievement of AID's energy objectives.

D. Private Enterprise

AID's private enterprise development policy directs the Agency to focus assistance in four priority sectors. These are agriculture, agribusiness, small and medium scale industry and privately operated service enterprises. This policy also recognizes the need for requisite rural infrastructure—such as transport, energy, water, and communication—as important means of encouraging private enterprise to serve the needs of the poor. Forest development and watershed management are critical activities in support of such infrastructural projects. Also, as the wood industry itself is characterized by strong forward and backward linkages and produces significant employment and income multiplier effects, it can provide an additional stimulus to the expansion of agribusiness and service enterprises within and outside agriculture. Thus, forestry development is not only a target for private enterprise but also an important agent of its expansion to other sectors of the economy.

Document 101

Statement by the U.S. Representative to the U.N. Development Program Governing Council (Benedick) Before the U.N. Fund for Population Activities, June 20, 1983 [14]

U.S. Commitment to Population Programs

Mr. President, distinguished delegates, 2 years ago, at the 28th Session of this Governing Council, I compared the current world phenomenon of population growth to falling snow—a gradual and seemingly imperceptible accumulation which only attracts attention when the problem is in a very advanced stage and consequently very difficult to solve. [15]

But 2 years ago, there were several million fewer people added to the world's population than will be added during this current year. Next year—and for many years thereafter—the increments will continue to rise.

Barring unforeseen events, most of the countries represented in this room will experience at least a doubling of their current population size within the next two generations—adding to and complicating already well-known problems of food supply, health, resource scarcity, pressure on the environment, unemployment, migration, and frustration of aspirations for a better life.

Mr. President, this is the reality which must deeply influence our deliberations at this meeting.

A more encouraging development in recent years has been the nearly universal recognition, by the leaders of the Third World countries most affected by this condition, that something has to be done to limit the continuing rapid rise in population—in order for these countries to make effective use of domestic investment and external assistance and thereby make meaningful progress toward attaining a better quality of life for their citizens. Symbolic of this significant change in attitude and policy is the continent of Africa, which now and for the foreseeable future will have the world's highest population growth rate. A survey this spring undertaken by U.S. Embassies in Africa revealed that almost everywhere on this continent significant changes in attitudes are underway. This greater recognition of the dangers of continued rapid growth in population has also been noted by observers from the UNFPA and the World Bank.

Mr. President, the United States especially welcomes and looks forward to the interventions at this meeting of the representatives of developing countries. They are the most important of all.

Against this background, the role of the UNFPA is particularly critical, as the world's largest multilateral agency dedicated to bridging the gap between recognition of the population problem, and effective measures to address it in an effective and yet humane way. Two years ago, this Council decided upon UNFPA's prospective role for the decade of the 1980s: South and North united in an historic reorientation of UNFPA's priorities, recognizing the urgent need to reduce birth rates and provide family planning services and education to the growing millions of people who need this help.

Mr. President, the United States wishes to commend Executive Director Rafael Salas and the UNFPA for the responsiveness and sensitivity with which this institution is responding to the wishes of this Council and the needs of the countries which its serves. We are impressed with the outstanding quality of the papers prepared for this meeting. In particular, document DP/1983/20, the Review and Assessment and Work Plan, is a model of a careful and sophisticated presentation of an extremely complex set of issues. Especially during a time of resource constraint, UNFPA's management deserves the appreciation of this Council for their candid and realistic approach toward future planning.

We also wish to note with gratification the progress being made by UNFPA in increasing its commitment to family planning and population communication programs, in response to the wishes of this Council. The increase in these activities in Africa to a proportion of over 50 percent in 1983 is especially noteworthy, and reflects the evolving wishes of African governments themselves, which I referred to earlier.

We are confident that these trends in UNFPA's programs worldwide will continue, and we particularly commend UNFPA's initiative in developing its "Policy Guidelines for UNFPA Support to Family Planning Programs," which was issued earlier this year.

Mr. President, enormous logistical difficulties still stand in the way of extension of these services to the people and communities who need them. The United States would like, in this context, to offer some observations on specific aspects of UNFPA's activities:

1. In order more effectively to meet the recognized priority needs, those UN executing agencies which spend most of the funds approved by this Council must design their programs and projects in greater conformity with the mandates of this Council—namely, the priority for family planning and related activities. The United States intends to pursue this matter in the governing bodies of other UN agencies, and we urge UNFPA and member governments represented here to do the same.

2. In the same spirit, we recommend that the UNFPA allot greater resources to direct country programs. This will imply greater responsibility for UNFPA field representatives, and therefore the United States strongly endorses UNFPA's proposal for rotation of staff between headquarters and the field.

3. In the experience of the United States in administering the world's largest population assistance programs for many years, we have found a tremendous vitality in the private sector. Voluntary family planning and population programs are most effective when they involve the active participation of the people through creative projects at community level, commercial retail sales of contraceptives, and the like. We believe that the energy and creativity of nongovernmental organizations can and should be more effectively harnessed by UNFPA, and we note with concern that both the amount and percentage of UNFPA funding through such organizations declined between 1981 and 1982. We urge that this trend be reversed.

Mr. President, our recommendation for greater UNFPA use of direct country projects and private organizations is consistent with Resolution 1763(LIV) of the Economic and Social Council, which encourages flexibility by directing UNFPA to "invite countries to utilize the most appropriate implementing agents for their programs."

4. The United States continues to support the targeted level of 25 percent for UNFPA intercountry programs. We believe that the criterion of cost effectiveness should be paramount in UNFPA program decisions, and we recognize the value of certain types of intercountry programs in this context, especially in the areas of biomedical and demographic research.

5. The need for safer, better, and more acceptable methods of fertility regulation continues to grow more urgent. This was the message of an international conference of science policymakers and researchers convened in Stockholm, Sweden in February of this year. The Governing Council last year stressed that research on contraceptives is "crucial" to the attainment of the Fund's objectives. If the term "crucial" is to have any meaning, we urge that, in connection with document DP/1983/21 on Family Planning Research, this Council direct UNFPA to assign highest priority for biomedical research, with a related but subordinate priority for program research.

Mr. President, the U.S. recommends that this Council direct UNFPA to adopt a "holistic" approach to biomedical research funding, in recognition of the multiplicity of effective international programs and networks active in such research. In this connection, I might cite the recent entry into this field of a UNESCO-associated agency, the International Organization for Chemistry in Development (IOCD), which includes among its directors a number of distinguished scientists, including the Swedish Nobel-laureate, Dr. Sune Bergstrom, who directed the outstanding report on contraceptive research produced last year for this Council. In addition, there are many other research organizations, which merit support in their efforts to find better contraceptives, including the International Committee for Contraceptive Research (ICCR), the Program for Applied Research in Fertility Regulation (PARFR), the WHO Special Program of Research in Human Reproduction, Family Health International (FHI), the Program for the Introduction and Adaptation of Contraceptive Technology (PIACE), and the Medical Research Councils of numerous individual countries. The United States is supporting many of these organizations; we also have bilateral agreements for cooperative research in human reproduction with India, China, and most recently, Italy, and we are discussing similar arrangements with several other countries. This is a field which deserves increasing priority by UNFPA and the international community.

In conclusion, I would like to stress the continued strong commitment of the United States Government, both the executive branch and the Congress, to be responsive to requests from developing countries for assistance to their population programs—through our bilateral programs, through private organizations, and through the excellent work of the UNFPA. This administration has reaffirmed that population concerns are an essential element of our development aid strategy. Even under conditions of extreme budgetary stringency, the high priority of this subject is reflected in the continuing increases in U.S. aid and research funding.

We have placed particular emphasis in designing policies and programs that are sensitive to local cultural and religious traditions. The United States will support only voluntary family planning activities. We strongly oppose any coercion in population programs, and we believe equally strongly that couples should be offered freedom to choose among a variety of ways of planning their family size, including various medically approved as well as the natural family planning (periodic abstinence) methods.

Thus, the United States believes in enlightened population policies, aiming ultimately at improvements in the quality of life of mothers and children, and of future generations. We believe that such policies and programs can be fully consistent with the values of human dignity and stability of the family which we cherish.

We are pleased to be associated with an organization like the UNFPA in pursuit of these important goals, and we look forward to working together with UNFPA and with other governments in making the 1984 International Conference on Population in Mexico City a true landmark on the road of human and national development.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Message From President Reagan to the Congress, July 11, 1983 [16]

"One of Our Principal Foreign Policy Goals . . . To Give Science and Technology a More Prominent Position in Our Relations With Other Countries"

In accordance with Title V of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1979 (Public Law 95–426), [17] I am pleased to transmit the 1982 annual report [18] on the United States Government's international activities in the field of science and technology. This report, as were its predecessors, has been prepared by the Department of State in collaboration with other concerned federal agencies.

[17] For text of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1979, approved on October 7, 1978, see 92 Stat. 963-995.

[18] Reference is to the annual congressional report, published since 1980, entitled "Science, Technology, and American Diplomacy." The report is part of Title V and includes updates on such topics as the environment, space, nuclear materials, telecommunications, agriculture, and international health. New U.S. multilateral and bilateral agreements are also included in the report.

In the past year, there have been several important developments in our international science relationships, all of them reflecting one of our principal foreign policy goals—to give science and technology a more prominent position in our relations with other countries. This is important not only to the conduct of our foreign relations, but to the successful fulfillment of many of our own science and technology objectives. As I have indicated in my Annual Science and Technology Report to the Congress, international collaboration can help advance many of our own national interests. Thus, I have asked my science advisor, Dr. George Keyworth, to pay special attention to international affairs and, throughout the federal government, concerted action has been taken to demonstrate our commitment to using the advances in science to overcome both national and international challenges.

There has been substantial progress. For the first time, international science cooperation was a subject for discussion among the leaders of the principal industrial democracies at the Versailles Summit. Those discussions led to a study by the Summit countries of the relationship between technology, employment, and growth, and to the establishment of eighteen new projects for cooperation among us. Although these projects will, in the first instance, be led by one or another of the Summit countries, they could eventually involve other countries and international organizations and lead, in time, to advances for countries of the Third World. These projects for enhanced cooperation were endorsed by the heads of state at the Williamsburg Summit and it was agreed that we would discuss them again at our next meeting.

Last July, Prime Minister Gandhi and I initiated a new program for enhanced scientific collaboration between the United States and India.[19] A group of some of the most distinguished scientists from both our countries met in India in January and prepared a farreaching program in medicine, agriculture, meteorology, and energy. Work began in April 1983, and we expect to see the first results within the next 24 months.

Similarly, when I visited Brazil late last year, President Figueiredo and I reaffirmed our desire to strengthen science and technology collaboration.[20] We have developed a program for joint work in five significant areas and, as part of our projected joint efforts in space, I proposed that a Brazilian payload specialist train with American astronauts for participation in a future space shuttle mission. When President Zia of Pakistan came to Washington in December, we agreed to establish a new Joint Commission to coordinate several bilateral activities, including common undertakings in science and technology.[21]

In May, Dr. Keyworth led a highly successful mission to China for the third meeting of the U.S.–PRC Joint Commission for Scientific and Technological Cooperation.[22] At the conclusion of the meeting, three new protocols on cooperation in nuclear physics and magnetic fusion, aeronautical science and technology, and transportation science and technology were signed. These supplement seventeen existing protocols that already include agriculture, students and scholars, space technology, high energy physics and hydropower. In addition to the new protocols a memorandum of understanding on cooperation in the basic biomedical sciences was also signed. It is in our fundamental interest to advance our relations with China. Science and technology are an essential part of that relationship and I have taken steps recently to ensure that China has improved access to the U.S. technology it needs for its economic modernization goals. We will continue to assist China through mutually beneficial cooperative efforts in science and technology.

We are continuing our cooperation with the U.S.S.R. in science and technology. This is a complex matter made more diffi-

[19] Prime Minister Indira Gandhi made an official visit to the United Nations, July 28–August 4, 1982. She was in Washington, July 28–31, where she met with President Reagan and other U.S. Government officials. As a result of these meetings, the two countries agreed upon measures to foster joint activities, among these expanded scientific collaborations, and cultural and educational exchanges.

[20] During President Reagan's 1982 trip to Latin America, he visited Brazil, December 1–2, at which time he met with Brazilian President General Joao Baptista de Oliveira Figueiredo.

[21] President Zia Ul-Haq of Pakistan visited the United States, December 6–14, 1982. He met with President Reagan and other U.S. officials from December 6 to 9.

[22] George A. Keyworth, II, chairman of the U.S. delegation, and 21 other delegates, attended the meeting from May 10 to 11, 1983.

cult because of Soviet behavior regarding Afghanistan and Poland, as well as their efforts to acquire sensitive Western technology. Decisions to renew agreements are being made on a case-by-case basis taking these concerns into account along with the benefits to the U.S. through participation. For example, I have recently approved the renewal of an agreement for cooperation with the Soviets on atomic energy, with appropriate limitations to protect our interests while letting the work proceed.

These examples suggest the range of our international effort in science and technology, but they are hardly exclusive. We have programs with more than three dozen countries, in every part of the world, at every level of sophistication. Science, as we know, has always had a special international character, and the advancement of science can make profound contributions to freedom and prosperity around the world. These tasks are formidable, for our scale of measurement must be decades, even generations. For this reason alone, our government, in a cooperative spirit, will continue to work closely with others prepared to join with us.

Remarks by Vice President Bush, Cape Canaveral, Florida, September 5, 1983 [23]

"Our Mission in Space Is To Strengthen Peace, Build Prosperity, and Expand Freedom for All Who Share Our Goals"

Thank you all very much. I want you to know that after seeing the playback of this morning's touchdown and then coming here on Labor Day to see and salute your families—well, I just have to believe that this is a great day for America.

And when we salute the contributions of your labor force at NASA, we're talking about one of the most diversified groups in America: union/nonunion, blue collar/white collar, high tech/manual, military and nonmilitary.

Thanks to every one of you, the five-man crew of the Challenger has blazed a new path of opportunity for all Americans and free people everywhere. Last Tuesday, they lit up nighttime skies like the Fourth of July, blasting off the face of this planet with barnstorming courage. Early this morning, they brought the Challenger back to Earth with cool, professional ease. They made it look so easy, you'd think they were flying the shuttle between New York and Washington.

The success of those brave Americans, and those who preceded them, opens the door to a golden era of discovery. Let me assure you and all our fellow citizens—your work is far from finished. In fact, I won't be slipping any secrets when I say: The United States space program has just begun, and it's going to get better and better. As that sleek, black-nosed bird glided to its precision landing, America's shuttle program really took off. By next year, we will be sending a shuttle into space nearly every month. Routine space travel will be within our grasp.

Our universe beckons us with treasures that will benefit all mankind. Opportunities for jobs, progress and human fulfillment will multiply as we marshall the power of high technology, push back our frontiers of knowledge and reach deeper and deeper into the unknown. What we have accomplished, what you have accomplished, is a tribute to American excellence—to our finest minds in Government, industry and our universities all pulling together for a greater good. As Americans, we can take pride in saying: We are first, we are the best, and we are so because we are free.

Our space program spurs innovation, makes us more competitive and raises the standard of living not just for our own people, but for people throughout the world. No other American activity so effectively demonstrates our technological leadership. On this latest flight of the Challenger, important experiments were conducted that can bring positive and far-reaching contributions to medicine. An on-board motor rocketed an Indian satellite into higher orbit. This will permit the Indian Government to broadcast radio and television to more than 100,000 villages. Telephone communications will be possible for the first time between remote regions of that country.

In October, the ninth Space Shuttle will carry an orbital laboratory developed by the European Space Agency called Spacelab. I had the honor of unveiling Spacelab, and I can tell you that it's a breathtaking piece of equipment. On this mission, two NASA Payload Specialists will be on board, including Dr. Ulf Merbold, a physicist from the Federal Republic of Germany. They will be conducting scientific experiments on behalf of more than 70 investigators from the United States, Europe and Japan.

By opening our cargo holds to our friends, we show that our mission in space is to strengthen peace, build prosperity and expand freedom for all who share our goals. America is a tremendous force for good, and don't let any cynic tell you differently. Our work in space carries on the worthy traditions of a proud and good people—a people who have brought light where there was darkness, heat where there was only cold, medicines where there was sickness and disease, food where there was hunger, wealth where humanity was living in squalor, and peace where there was only death and bloodshed.

The outrageous events of last week—the barbaric shooting down of that Korean Air Liner—should remind us of something else, too. We live in a dangerous world—a world where others reject our ideals and wantonly disregard individual rights and the value of human life. It is therefore our duty to remain ever vigilant and strong, that we might remain ever free.

One more thought on this cowardly incident. The fact is bad enough—the wanton destruction of a civilian airliner that was off course but was flashing its strobe lights, that was tracked for literally hundreds of miles, that was eyeballed by the Soviet pilot from only several hundred yards away, and was then destroyed as that same pilot pulled the trigger that released the missile—that killed 269 human beings.

But then there's the lie—the big Soviet lie—no regrets, just the lie.

It wouldn't make it right if the Soviet leadership would say a horrible mistake was made and we are sorry. It wouldn't make it right, but it would help some.

It's not just the act—it's the lie and the lack of concern for the 269 people from at least 13 different countries who lost their lives.

And as we approach NASA's 25th anniversary, let me make one thing plain: the U.S. commitment to leadership on space must be maintained—and it will be maintained.

We will be maintaining a record that your Administrator, Jim Beggs, rightly described as "25 years of reaching for excellence and achieving it in space and aeronautics." Standing there beside that magnificent complex, with the Stars and Stripes draped in her glory, one is filled with memories of America's quest for space leadership. We didn't waste time following the shock of Sputnik. America's first satellite, Explorer I, was launched from the Cape in 1958.

Since that historic day, the U.S. space program has surmounted greater and greater challenges: Pioneer, Mercury, Gemini, Apollo, Skylab, Viking, Voyager, and now the Shuttle, our workhorse in space. We never hid our missions from anyone. That's not the way of freedom-loving people. We've always been courageous and honest enough to carry them out in full view of the world. Each time we risked failure. But each time the world held its breath, America met her challenge with success—and that is the way of freedom-loving people.

Neil Armstrong spoke his famous words, "... one small step for a man, one giant leap for mankind." The American flag is planted on the moon's surface. The only footprints ever to touch its surface were made by American astronauts.

It is appropriate that all Americans celebrate the success of today's most recent space venture on Labor Day. For all the various groups here at Kennedy Space Center, as I mentioned earlier, represent a microcosm of the diversified U.S. labor force.

On this 101st Labor Day, we honor all those men and women who have worked to make America the most productive society in the history of mankind. The United States is emerging now from a painful recession with a vigorous recovery—a recovery without inflation and with significantly lower interest rates than we were experiencing just 2 1/2 years ago. We are beginning to see unemployment drop and new jobs are being created in all areas of the private sector. This economic climate will allow all American workers the greatest opportunity for progress, and I believe American industry, labor, and technology will meet the new challenges facing our country in the years ahead—just as you have overcome every obstacle to achieve the success we celebrate here today.

With your great talent, the genius of our people, and the commitment of this administration, America will continue to reach boldly into the unknown. I am confident we will open new frontiers, use our knowledge for peace, and share the rewards of our exploration with people everywhere. The next 25 years will provide dazzling new opportunities for the peaceful expansion of our civilization into space.

Testimony by the Acting Assistant Secretary of State for Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs (Marshall) Before a Subcommittee of the House Governmental Operations Committee, September 28, 1983 [24]

Foreign Policy Benefits Provided by LANDSAT

MR. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have the opportunity to discuss with you the international implications of the proposed transfer of the Government's civil land remote sensing satellite system, or Landsat, to the private sector.

First, I should say that, contrary to what the first paragraph of that article in the Washington Post said this morning, there is no change. The President has not directed a change in U.S. Government policy regarding distribution of its data from Landsat.

MR. BROOKS. Excuse me, Mr. Marshall, I would like to recognize a former distinguished member of this committee and a former distinguished Member of the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives, John Culver.

Please continue, Mr. Marshall.

MR. MARSHALL. I might also say, Mr. Chairman, that we cannot agree wholly with everything that the GAO and OTA representatives said here this morning. In many respects we feel that they are prejudging what the response will be to the work that is now going on as Mr. Kammer has described it for you.

The launch of Landsat 1 in 1969 initiated an era of experimental Earth remote sensing from space. The United States initiated this effort which became an important element in the social and economic development projects of many nations.

Now we are on the verge of a possible new era in Earth remote sensing from space. The system has proved itself both nationally and internationally. A measurable body of national and international users has emerged.

By the end of this decade, Earth remote sensing will almost certainly be conducted by a number of countries and international entities on a competitive and more or less commercial basis.

On March 8, the President directed the administration to seek through competitive means a private commercial operator to continue this country's Landsat program. The State Department is participating in the process of implementing this directive.

The terms under which U.S. Landsat data have been available have promoted programs for application of land remote sensing data to serve both national and global needs. International participation and cooperation have been intrinsic to the success of these programs. Today, Landsat ground receiving stations are operating, being built, or are under active consideration in Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, India, Italy, Japan, Romania, Saudi Arabia, South Africa, Sweden, and Thailand. These stations are, or will be, equipped to receive directly Landsat data for analysis and distribution. The ground stations, combined with the U.S. Earth Resources Observation Station [EROS] Data Center in Sioux Falls, S. Dak., comprise a readily accessible world data network. These distribution facilities make Landsat data available to the public worldwide.

The land remote sensing program [Landsat][25] has generated a number of foreign policy benefits. First, the United States gains access to land observation data from parts of the world which would not be possible with ground stations located only in the United States. This enhances ongoing U.S. land remote sensing ground truth measurement campaigns.

It assists our scientists in ongoing scientific study efforts. It also improves our technological edge by helping U.S. scientists and engineers develop new and more extensive applications for remote sensing and specific remote sensing instrumentation.

Second, through Landsat we provide land observation data to users worldwide, much to our advantage. With U.S. assistance Landsat data are used in the developing world for estimating crop acreage and monitoring timber lands, range lands, deserts, and water resources; for mineral and oil exploration; land use planning; disaster assessment; and environmental protection.

The international network which the United States has spawned is demonstrable proof that the United States can help developing nations use space technology for practical applications.

Third, foreign participation in the U.S. Landsat program encourages foreign governments and scientists to use and rely on the U.S. system for both practical and scientific applications. Politically, technologically, and economically, Landsat brings countries closer to the United States.

We believe transfer of Landsat to the private sector, if in fact an appropriate recipient is found, for commercial operation could improve the program and in turn enhance these foreign policy benefits. We believe commercialization could attract increased foreign use through market development and perhaps through more flexible pricing policies. It will further U.S. technical innovations, expand U.S. civil space activity and presence, and provide greater distribution.

Most important, commercialization may be the most effective way to assure continuity of high technology data through applied economies and innovative market development.

Foreign policy implications relating to commercialization are basically twofold. First, the Department of State must be concerned that commercialization will be implemented in a manner that insures adherence to international obligations of the United States.

Second, the Department of State seeks to insure that the foreign policy benefits we have derived from Landsat are not eroded.

Our main international obligations are embodied in three international agreements.

The 1967 United Nations Outer Space Treaty which establishes that all states parties to this treaty shall be responsible for all activities of their nationals in outer space, whether those nationals are government agencies or nongovernmental entities such as a private commercial space operator. The Convention of International Liability for Damage Caused by Space Objects and the Convention on Registration of Objects Launched Into Outer Space, both of which reconfirm the responsibility of states parties for the activities of all nationals in outer space. Both also stipulate the acceptance of states parties of liability for damages caused by objects launched from their soil by their nationals and the responsibility of states parties to register all such objects with the United Nations.

To insure continuing adherence to our international obligations, the U.S. Government, through the Department of State, must have adequate authority and opportunity for supervision of: (1) the compliance by private owners or operators of space systems with overall U.S. international treaty obligations and general space policies; and (2) the relations of the private owners or operators of U.S. space systems with foreign governments, foreign agencies, international bodies, and foreign business entities.

With these safeguards, it is our opinion that private ownership of the Landsat system would benefit our foreign policy interests. The continuation of a U.S. Landsat system and program will be assured at least for the lifetime of an initial contract between the Government and a private owner or operator. Earth remote sensing data continuity from a single system, which has been a frequently voiced objective of many interested individuals and entities both in the private business sector and elsewhere, will be promoted.

In short, the President's decision to transfer the present civil Landsat system and program to the private sector presents no inherent obstacles for the conduct of foreign affairs. There were conditions in his decision; namely, that the foreign policy considerations must be addressed and it must be at competitive terms. This has been characterized by Secretary Baldrige as meaning that it has to be a good deal for the U.S. taxpayers.

We know that the international community is watching our early efforts toward commercialization closely. We received limited foreign reaction, through various informal contacts, bilaterally and in international forums, shortly after the President's announcement on March 8, 1983. Before that, we had responses as well because the previous administration had announced in 1978 that it intended to transfer this program.

Early informal responses were not extensive and focused primarily on access to Metsat data. We have since kept key governments informed of further developments in the commercialization effort and await further reports on foreign reactions from our embassies abroad.

I might say that France, Italy, and the United Kingdom have provided rather positive responses, particularly a response we have received recently from France.

I might add that we would welcome as well information which may have been obtained by the Government Accounting Office, and referred to today in their testimony, during the recent discussions with GAO staff and selected foreign governments.

Through the State Department's participation in the SEB and through our controls set forth in the request for proposals, we will be able to address effectively any adverse effects upon our foreign relations.

Let me now speak briefly on concerns relating to data availability. We will encourage the private operator to make data available on an open and nondiscriminatory basis. More specifically, consultations with Government agencies, including the Department of State, would be required if a private operator wished to pursue data policies other than those which the U.S. Government now pursues.

We believe that commercial Landsat activities must be permitted an element of flexibility because the international climate for Earth remote sensing from space may well change by the end of this decade.

Accordingly, the United States should not place a prospective U.S. operator of a Landsat system at an immediate competitive disadvantage with foreign operators in an international market.

It is anticipated that in little more than a year—January 1985—France will launch the first of several contemplated SPOT Earth remote sensing satellites. SPOT is a technologically sophisticated and advanced Earth remote sensing satellite system. The French have advertised SPOT widely and vigorously throughout the world. They have not clearly announced as yet a firm data distribution policy and practice. Nor has Japan, which expects to launch civil Earth remote sensing satellites in 1986 or 1987 and in 1990 which are expected to utilize advanced technologies.

Although their first satellite will possess land remote sensing capabilities, it will be devoted largely to ocean sensing, while their second satellite will be devoted primarily to land remote sensing. Japan's Ministry of Industry and Trade [MITI] and the Japanese Space Agency share responsibility for development of these satellites.

In view of future uncertainties as to how civil remote sensing from space will be conducted by a variety of international operators, the Department of State has concluded, following consultations with other responsible agencies, that the best policy to pursue at this time with respect to practices demanded of a prospective private Landsat commercial operator should be one of commonsense flexibility.

Our policy is to encourage a private operator to maintain Landsat data processing and provision on an open, nondiscriminatory basis. We believe it unwise to prematurely burden an operator with prior constraints at the outset that may place him at a competitive disadvantage vis-a-vis his international commercial rivals.

At the same time, a private U.S. Landsat operator should not be permitted to change his data processing and distribution policies in ways that would harm or jeopardize fundamental U.S. foreign policy interests and obligations.

A future in which international territories may well be remotely sensed by the systems of three or four or perhaps even more national entities or international entities remains a real possibility though sometimes difficult to envision.

We all know how difficult it is to predict the course of international politics 5 or 10 years in the future. Given budgetary and programmatic restraints, we firmly believe that commercialization of this country's Landsat capabilities under prudent but commonsense supervisory constraints will best satisfy the national interest in coming years in the important area of satellite Earth remote sensing.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I just want to add that we do very much look forward to the continuation of our consultation with your committee staff and with the other relevant committees on the Hill.

We do appreciate your input.

Thank you.

MR. BROOKS. I have about 13 questions that I will submit to you for a written response for the record.

Without objection, the record will remain open to receive those responses.

Testimony by the Special Adviser for International Affairs, Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs (Wolfe), Before a Subcommittee of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, September 028, 1983 [26]

U.S. Policy for Protecting Whales

. . . . . .

The commercial whaling moratorium decision reached at the IWC 34th annual meeting in July 1982 was a milestone for the many years of international efforts by the United States, working within the IWC to achieve protection for all population of whales. Generally the results of the 35th annual meeting of the IWC held in July of this year, well outlined by Dr. Byrne, were also very positive.

Commercial whaling catch limits were set at a level consistent with the IWC moratorium decision, which will allow continued whaling in the transition in order to lessen the economic and social effects for industries of the whaling countries. However, the 1984 catch limits represent an overall reduction of more than 20 percent from previous levels.

The Department of State is closely involved in the preparation and negotiation of U.S. Government positions regarding the IWC. In particular we see our responsibility as follows: One, to insure that other member governments of the IWC are apprised of U.S. positions on issues before the Commission; two, to convey to our delegation and Government agencies foreign interests and positions on IWC matters; three, to insure that IWC policies are consistent with our broader foreign policy objectives; and, four, to insure that our IWC positions are consistent with other international treaties and negotiations.

At present, in collaboration with Dr. Byrne, the U.S. Commissioner to the IWC, and other U.S. Government agencies and nongovernmental groups, and interested Members of Congress and staff, we are involved in efforts to implement the IWC moratorium decision.

Since the IWC established a moratorium on all commercial whaling beginning in 1985–86, the Department of State has conveyed the strong support of the U.S. Government for the full and effective implementation of the IWC decision to the governments of all the whaling nations. We have made a special effort to stress the need for adherence to the regulations of the Commission. We have explained the provisions of the Packwood-Magnuson amendment to the Magnuson Fisheries Conservation and Management Act, and the Pelly amendment to the Fishermen's Protective Act, in detail, and informed the nations potentially affected of the implication of these two amendments and the determination of this Government to use them if the IWC regulations are thwarted.

We have conveyed this strong commitment through all available diplomatic channels. This has involved the highest levels of the Department of State, including personal letters from Secretary Shultz on at least three different occasions. I have traveled to Iceland and the Republic of Korea to discuss the importance of the IWC moratorium decision and the U.S. commitment to its implementation.

As a result of extensive discussions with the Governments of Iceland, the Republic of Korea, and Chile, we were assured that they decided not to object to the cessation decision and are taking active measures to phase out whaling to comply with the cessation. The Government of Brazil has provided us with similar assurances. As indicated by Dr. Byrne, the Government of Chile has prohibited all whaling as of July 1983 and reiterated its intent to comply with the IWC moratorium. With the Government of Peru's objection to the IWC moratorium decision withdrawn as of July 1983, the objections made by the Governments of Japan, Norway, and the U.S.S.R. remain.

As you know, any country may withdraw its objection at any time, and the Governments of Japan and Norway have stated that they are keeping their options open and that their objections do not mean that they have made a final decision in the matter. To date, the Government of the U.S.S.R. has not made such a statement. We have conveyed to the Soviet Union that we are reviewing their whaling operations for possible certification for lack of compliance with the cold harpoon ban, and in light of their position on the IWC moratorium decision.

We are engaged in continuing consultations with the Governments of Japan and Norway in order to successfully implement our national policy. The Department of State has traveled to Norway twice within the last year, and we recently met with the Norwegians here in Washington and expect to see them once again in the very near future. We have been invited to meet with the Japanese sometime in November. Our bilateral relations with these countries are highly valued, and we will continue to use all diplomatic means available to us to gain implementation of the IWC decision and avoid a confrontation which could adversely affect these close relations. Our efforts have involved the highest level of government.

Given the importance which the administration, the Congress, and the American people attach to the effective protection of whale populations represented in the IWC moratorium decision, we believe that U.S. domestic legislation provides a useful tool in situations where there is no other approach open for us. We are also aware that fishery-related sanctions that the Pelly and Packwood amendments authorize to be imposed could potentially entail domestic costs. However, we are very hopeful that it will not be necessary to invoke this legislation, and will continue to use every opportunity to insure that all avenues of negotiation are utilized to insure this.

In our bilateral discussions we continue to stress that our important and close bilateral ties could be affected as long as these objections to the IWC moratorium decision remain and we achieve no indication of substantial progress toward this important U.S. policy objective. We would generally characterize the discussions to date with various foreign countries on this issue as constructive and resulting in a better understanding of the implications of the IWC moratorium decision. We remain committed to use all diplomatic and legal means available to us to gain the successful implementation of the IWC moratorium decision.

That concludes my statement, Mr. Chairman, and just as Dr. Byrne, I would be happy to respond to questions.

MR. BREAUX. Thank you very much.

Address by the Administrator of the Agency for International Development (McPherson) Before the National Wildlife Federation, December 7, 1983 [27]

AID's Role in the Environmentally Sound Development of Lesser Developed Countries

I hold a belief that the original environmentalists in early America were the farmers and dedicated people—people such as yourselves.

I'm proud to say the McPhersons have been farmers for many generations. I was raised on the family farm in Michigan. I remember my father's comments about a neighbor who was letting his land erode. Father thought it was immoral. On our farm, hunting, trapping, and fishing were very important. For example, I learned the need not to overtrap muskrats in any one season, so as to be sure there was a good stock the next year.

Many of you share this heritage as farmers or as conservationist sportsmen.

To me, the vitality of the environment is interwoven with the abundance of the land, the wildlife and the streams. This is a knowledge not simply of the mind, but of the heart.

For me, this knowledge of the interdependency of our continued existence and good stewardship of the land was reinforced by some of my experiences in the Peace Corps in Peru.

Accordingly, when I was named Administrator of AID, I brought with me a firm concept of rational economic development. The environment, if respected, is a vital friend of humanity—if violated and abused, it turns upon us and extracts revenge.

Economic development and environment can be consistent. Indeed, compatibility is just good business.

Several groups, such as the Conservation Foundation and the World Wildlife Fund of the U.S., have placed that reality in proper perspective. Russell Train, as director of the Conservation Foundation in the mid-sixties, said:

> "The principal thrust of our activities is to dovetail development and conservation efforts—to demonstrate that development and effective conservation can and should go hand-in-hand."

This is clearly true today.

Elaborating on that general goal today, I would like to discuss our leadership role in this task, the objectives of the Agency for International Development (AID) as it pertains to the environment, our strategy for accomplishing those objectives, and, make a few comments about the importance of biological diversity.

AID has taken a leadership role in bringing the message and the means of environmentally sound development to the Third World. This includes: environmental analysis of poor countries; working to improve foreign country policies; building human and institutional capability; technical and information exchange; environmental research; and, urging other donors to have strong environment efforts.

A great deal of AID's attention has focused on farmland and forest areas of the world. For example, the AID mission in the Dominican Republic was appalled by the extent of burning that had been done in the forests of that land. AID showed the government, through the preparation of an environmental profile, what would result if that practice was not stopped. As a consequence the Dominican Republic and AID are working closely to bring about government policy reforms, education at the grass roots, and a program of soil conservation, water management and forestry.

[27] Source: Department of State files. McPherson addressed the 30th Annual Conservation Conference of the National Wildlife Federation in Washington.

Another example of our leadership is in Haiti. In that country, AID is working with farmers to change the way they farm. We are urging them to plant on the contour, to use hillside ditches, and to plant trees that are fast-growing and nitrogen-fixing.

AID has developed a set of six practical strategies for our continual leadership in environment work.

Strategy 1—Environmental analysis. These are technical analyses prepared during the design phase of a project on the possible environmental consequences of a proposed project.

Such analysis cannot be an afterthought. It must be a component integrated into the design.

For example, AID is helping countries such as Rwanda, Somalia, and Gambia to plan for orderly development of river basins. This will ensure against future erosion and degradation of these vast basins.

Strategy 2—Work to improve the environmental policies of poor countries. We are working with foreign governments to show them the importance of adopting sound environmental and natural resource policies.

We also provide assistance to grassroots conservation organizations and support study groups helping them to disseminate useful information.

In some cases, policy change is a condition to a loan or grant from us.

Strategy 3—Work to build human and institutional capability. We recognize the complexity of natural resource management problems. Long-term commitments are required to build both human and institutional capability. Band-aid approaches or "quick fixes" just don't work.

Obviously training is critical in our efforts. For example, recently AID sponsored training sessions in Sri Lanka. Part of the program included a policy development seminar for high-level officials on environmental assessment procedures.

Additionally, a 3-week training session was conducted for other senior staff.

Also, in Sri Lanka, emphasis will be placed on conservation training at the local level.

Strategy 4—Technology and information exchange. The capability of a developing country to respond to environmental issues depends to a large degree on the availability of useful technology and techniques. To help provide this we're tapping expertise that exists within the United States.

For example, Tenneco and Amax Corporations have made staff available to travel to Tunisia and help work out technical problems in paper mills, steel plants, and mining operations. AID funds only travel and daily expenses. The American corporations pay the salaries of their employees.

U.S. universities are being a big help. For example, one consortium of twelve of these institutions and the U.S. Department of Agriculture are providing on-site crop protection advice to AID missions and countries. The focus of this work is the development of integrated pest management plans and advice on appropriate agricultural chemicals.

Environmental organizations also play an important role. For example, the World Wildlife Fund is working with AID in Brazil in developing an inventory of what is available and what training is needed in South America. We need—and are receiving—environmental communities' help and advice. We welcome a continuation of that partnership.

Strategy 5—Environmental research. AID funds some environmental science and forestry research of direct use to AID programs.

For example, AID is on the threshold of a new 10-year program in forestry research. The program is in its design stages. It will provide a research network among many nations. Most forestry research of the past has focused on the temperate zones, like the U.S. and Europe. Our new research will center on other areas of the world.

Forest research is a long-term commitment of AID and one which I feel is very necessary.

The development problems of arid and semi-arid regions arise from the fact that they have been settled for long periods of time, overexploited, and tend to be worn out. Research is often needed. Another example, in Mauritania, Africa. AID has embarked on extensive research efforts to define suitable development approaches for each of the four basic ecological zones in that country. These include oases, river bank, coastal, and desert areas. As always, our objective is to help the people help themselves in the restoration of their natural resources.

Research is also needed in rapidly growing urban areas which need water and sewerage systems with low operating and maintenance requirements. To cite an instance, AID is discussing with the Egyptian Government a program to help finance the rehabilitation and expansion of the water sewerage treatment systems in Cairo, Alexandria, and the Canal cities.

Strategy 6—AID will continue to work with the donors to get them to have strong environmental programs.

The leadership AID has provided in this area has been well received. For example, the World Bank has joined us in the effort to help educate people in the safe use of pesticides. The Canadian aid program came to visit us in Washington last week to see what we are doing.

At this point I want to address an issue of special concern to most of you—specifically, the matter of biological diversity.

As you know, most of the world's biological resources originated in tropical regions which contain the richest assortment of species. Many of these have not been evaluated for possible human uses. Population growth is causing a rapid decrease in the availability of plant and animal genetic resources because of habitat destruction and increased use of toxic chemicals.

In recognition of the importance of this issue, in November 1981 I called and cosponsored a Strategy Conference on Biological Diversity. Participants, in addition to AID, included the State Department and five other Federal agencies. A number of recommendations emerged from the Conference and we are following up. We have provided guidance to AID missions abroad on activities related to biological diversity.

As an example of the work AID is doing in this area, the Missouri Botanical Gardens, on contract with AID, is collecting, identifying, and cataloging plant and animal species in the high jungle of Peru. I expect to see similar activities established in connection with traditional development projects, especially those opening up new areas where species can be lost before they are known.

Congress recently augmented this initiative by enacting legislation which essentially directs us, and certain other government agencies, to develop a U.S. strategy on biological diversity in developing countries.

I have instructed Dr. Syle Brady, my senior Assistant Administrator and head of our Bureau for Science and Technology, to personally oversee the preparation of a strategy on biological diversity. Some of you will remember that Dr. Brady headed up the International Rice Research Institute (IRRI) of Green Revolution fame. Dr. Brady expects to bring together scientists and other experts from various federal agencies to help augment AID's technical capabilities in this area. This guidance will be utilized by our missions around the world and will be provided to developing nations. It will also be provided to other donor nations.

In summary, the United States has taken the lead in promoting environmentally sound economic development. We, and other developed countries, have begun to join forces to bring this critical issue to the attention of all countries and people.

AID, under the Reagan administration, is committed to the specific strategies which I've outlined here today. We will support environmentally sound and sustainable economic development in the host countries we assist. We will continue to pursue the critical task of preserving biological diversity.

In all of this, I repeat again—we need your active involvement. We consider you part of our constituency. We've come a long way. We have far to go.

I am convinced, with you, that the protection and enhancement of the environment is essential to the success of sound economic development.

U.S. Oceans Policy

SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT OFFICIAL. Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. I am most pleased to inform you that today President Reagan issued a statement of oceans policy and established by Presidential proclamation an exclusive economic zone. [2]

This proclamation of an exclusive economic zone, or an EEZ as it is sometimes referred to, confirms United States sovereign rights and control over the living and nonliving natural resources of the seabed, subsoil, and super-adjacent waters beyond the territorial sea, but within 200 nautical miles of our coast.

The EEZ applies to waters adjacent to the United States, to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, and United States overseas possessions and territories.

The EEZ is widely regarded as a lawful claim of jurisdiction under international law. Over 50 nations already claim some form of EEZ, and it is included in the recently completed Law of the Sea Convention.

The President's proclamation clearly establishes United States jurisdiction and control over seabed mineral resources off the coast but within 200 nautical miles.

The President's proclamation does not materially affect our existing jurisdiction over fisheries resources.

In establishing an EEZ, the United States has limited its claim of jurisdiction to resource-related rights. Within our EEZ, all nations will continue to enjoy nonresource related freedom of the high seas, such as navigation and overflight.

Ladies and gentlemen, I would be happy to take your questions.

Q. How does this relate to the Law of the Sea treaty. Is this in place of our signing it?

A. As you know, the President decided in July of 1982 not to sign the Law of the Sea treaty, [3] and at that time we undertook a very extensive review of the next step as far as oceans policy was concerned.

Our objection to the Law of the Sea treaty turned around the deep seabed mining portions of the text, not the non-deep seabed mining—not the non-deep seabed portions of the text.

Consequently, we view this step of the declaration of an economic zone following this review to be a positive, next step in terms of the development of our oceans policy. We feel that it is completely in accord with international law as that international law is embodied in those portions of the LOS convention that covered this area. So we think that this is the appropriate way to move at this time, and that is the relationship to the LOS treaty.

Q. Is this consistent with the Law of the Sea?

A. Yes. I believe I just answered that. It is consistent with international law as that international law is reflected in the EEZ portions of the Law of the Sea treaty.

It does not stem from the Law of the Sea treaty, but those provisions are consistent with international law.

Q. Just out of curiosity, because I know very little about this—the fact that we're claiming a 200-mile zone around the possessions, such as the Marianas, would the Law of the Sea agreement also envision such a right?

A. The Law of the Sea would envision a right after, of course, it comes into force—it is not in force, as you know, at the present time. It may be many years, if it comes into force at all—but it would provide for the establishment by signatories to the agreement based upon international law of such zones.

The zones that can be established—again, I come back to the fact—are clearly a right under international law as it has developed. That is reflected in the treaty so that it would be permissible under the treaty.

But if the treaty were in force, and if the United States were a party to the treaty, we would have the same sort of a situation as far as the economic zone is concerned.

As you can see, it's the portions that are outlined here in the blue.

Q. That applies to possessions like the Marianas and Puerto Rico as well?

A. It applies to the Northern Marianas. The Northern Marianas, the Commonwealth of Northern Marianas, of course is in a developing state, but under the covenant and the U.N. trusteeship agreement, it would be applied—we will apply it to the Northern Marianas, as well as Guam, to Wake, to Midway, to the Hawaiian chain, to Johnston atoll, and to the other possessions within the Pacific area, as well, of course, to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands and the continental United States and Alaska.

Q. But that would be consistent with Law of the Sea as well.

A. That would be consistent with the provisions of the treaty. That's correct.

Q. Could the signatories to the Law of the Sea treaty take similar action in respect to their 200-mile limits at the present time?

A. Oh, yes, indeed. That obviously follows from the answer that I just gave. They could indeed do so. Indeed, 56 countries have already established economic zones. These economic zones are, however, varying in nature.

It will be our position that we would be prepared to recognize the establishment of economic zones by other countries even before the treaty comes into force.

If those economic zones are consistent with international law as reflected in the treaty, and if the countries establishing those zones—the coastal states establishing those zones—would recognize the rights of other countries in their zones, and they would not be inconsistent with international law. So that, yes, other countries can establish these zones, many have, and that would be our position as far as recognition of those zones is concerned.

Q. Establishing these zones, of course, you're not ruling out exploration anywhere else in international waters, are you? This is an exclusive zone.

A. No. It is the position of the United States that beyond the 200-mile economic zone that seabed mining —which I believe you're referring to here—is a high seas freedom to be pursued as a high seas right, which basically means that a country would have the right to pursue that as long as it does not interfere with the sovereignty of any other country.

But that is beyond the zone that you're talking about there. It is not within the zone. Resource-related matters within the zone are entirely under the jurisdiction of the coastal state, in this case the United States.

Q. Do you have a rough area for those zones claimed in the Pacific territories there?

A. Yes. I can give you a rough idea. In the statement you will note that it says "in excess of 2,000,000 square nautical miles."

Indeed, the 2,000,000 square nautical miles applies to the zone around the continental United States, but would exclude the Hawaiian Islands and the Pacific area.

If you total up the entire amount, it would be somewhere around 4,000,000 square nautical miles, probably a little over that.

Q. Why 200 miles? Is that a traditional, economic zone? Why not 300, why not 1,000?

A. This is the zone that has really been developed through international law and is reflected in the portions of the Law of the Sea treaty that applies to it, so that you will find there that it is 200 miles.

As you know, the United States already has a 200-mile fishery zone, but the EEZ is something that has come to rest after 200 miles as far as the developing international law of this subject is concerned—as I say, as it has been reflected in the treaty text.

Q. You say here where there's a conflict in zone between a couple of nations, it will be settled in accordance with equitable principles.

What are the equitable principles?

A. The equitable principles would be equity under the particular circumstances, and that may encompass various considerations. It might encompass in some case, medium [median?] lines, it might encompass variation from medium [median?] lines in other circumstances.

We don't think that all situations are subject to the same sort of resolution, but the resolution between exclusive economic zones should be on the basis of equitable principles.

Q. It will basically be worked out between the two countries involved?

A. That's correct.

Q. Could you expand on any impact the proclamation might have in two areas: On the U.S. tuna industry and in marine scientific research?

A. Yes. I'd be happy to. There is a specific exclusion from the zone for tuna. As you know, since the passage of the Magnuson Act in 1976, the Fisheries Conservation and Management Act,[4] there has been an exclusion for highly migratory species of tuna.

We do not recognize the jurisdiction of any other coastal state, and we do not assert jurisdiction in the United States beyond 12 nautical miles over tuna.

This particular exclusion is also made from the assertion of fisheries jurisdiction within the economic zone. So the economic zone then will specifically exclude tuna.

As far as the marine scientific research is concerned, although the provisions of the Law of the Sea treaty applicable in this area would give us the right to assert jurisdiction over foreign flag vessels doing marine scientific research in the U.S. exclusive economic zone, we have determined that we will not assert that jurisdiction. That the matter of freedom of marine scientific research is an important one to this country and to its scientific community, and we will not assert that.

However, we will recognize the assertion of such authority by other states having economic zones as long as that assertion is consonant with international law and it is asserted in a reasonable way.

Further, we will assist U.S. scientists in achieving the necessary authorization in those cases to undertake this research. But the United States has determined that, although it would have the right to do so, it will not assert this right over marine scientific research in its zone.

Q. In just one other area: Would this have any impact at all in the negotiations in the International Whaling Commission—on the moratorium?

A. No. This will not have any impact on the IWC at all. We will continue as far as the situation on marine mammals is concerned, and particularly on the IWC to recognize the IWC protection of whales.

As you know, at the present time we defer on marine mammals to the appropriate international agreements in that connection, and we will continue to do that, although we clearly have the authority under the economic zone to control those, but we will handle it in that way.

Q. A simple-minded question, but if this is consistent with the Law of the Sea why didn't we simply sign the Law of the Sea?

A. I think I answered that question just a few moments ago, when I said that the reason that we did not sign the Law of the Sea treaty was because the President's concerns and objectives that he stated in January of 1982 simply were not met.

Those related to deep seabed mining. They did not relate to the other portions of the Law of the Sea text which is involved here.

The basic reason, then, for our nonsigning of the Law of the Sea revolves around the deep sea mining aspects. I think that you and probably others are fairly well aware we've made our position quite clear on the reason for non-signing because we did not achieve the changes that we felt were necessary to have a regime for deep seabed mining; that when deep seabed mining becomes economically feasible and appropriate, we would be in a position to appropriately mine under American flag and under the circumstances that we felt would be necessary for mining and necessary for protection of our economic interest and indeed, our strategic interests. It has nothing to do with this part of the treaty.

Q. Would this proclamation—when does it go into effect? Immediately?

A. Immediately. It went into effect—it will go into effect today. Yes.

Q. Within the Federal bureaucracy there are several agencies and departments which have jurisdiction over various areas that this proclamation affects. Have you decided to name one agency the lead agency for the 200-mile zone or have you decided on a coordinating body, for example?

A. We have made no decisions in that connection yet. The proclamation and the accompanying statement really are as far as matters go at this point. Obviously, I think it can be assumed that certain implementing legislation will be necessary to carry out the provisions of the proclamation. That, of course, is something that has not yet been fully addressed as yet either.

Q. You make this sound like a fairly routine exercise to assert claim to these areas which makes me wonder why it hasn't been done previously?

A. After we made the decision on nonsigning in July, we undertook a very, very thorough review and study of what the appropriate next steps in our ocean policy development should be.

After that rather complete review and after a complete agreement amongst the relevant departments and agencies and a unanimous recommendation of the Cabinet on this matter to the President, it was deemed that this was the appropriate next step to take.

We think that, of course, it clearly signals that the United States will comport itself with international law in this area as that has been reflected in the LOS treaty text. We believe that it will be essentially a model for other countries that will establish such zones, and there will probably be a number of countries that will do this before the Law of the Sea treaty comes into effect. As I say, if it does come into effect.

The more that we can have consistent zones—zones that are essentially consistent with the provisions of the text reflecting international law, the better off we will be. So that we felt that it was a very appropriate step in the development of our national oceans policy in the wake of our decision on the nonsigning of the LOS treaty.

Q. Are there likely to be significant objections from other countries?

A. We consulted very, very broadly in that connection with other countries. I would have to say that there was a somewhat variable response in that connection, although overall the response has been quite moderate.

Those countries that oppose the decision of the United States not to sign the LOS treaty could be in general characterized perhaps as being the most concerned about our declaration here.

There are some countries also that have some question with regard to our position on the tuna exclusion. However, I would remind you that our position on tuna—has been our position since 1976—would continue to be our position even on the hypothetical assumption that the United States were a party to the LOS treaty and the LOS treaty were in force. We would still take the exception on that.

So there's basically no difference on that. However, I think that there is very little question that the countries, both our allies and friends and those that are perhaps not in that category but are concerned with the Law of the Sea, will certainly recognize the United States exclusive economic zone.

Q. Are there any areas like the Caribbean or up around Alaska where our 200 miles bump into somebody else's 200 miles?

A. Yes. You do have areas in the Caribbean. Obviously, you have areas where these would touch, but that would not provide any problem. We would not obviously assert out to the full 200 miles if you had a situation where it would abut against another country's exclusive economic zone.

Q. How about Alaska?

A. You're talking about this area right here with the Soviet Union?

Q. Yes.

A. This is a line of demarcation that was established back in 1967. There is some dispute over this particular part of the area and you see this little white area within the blue, that is being addressed at this present time, but, again, there is not going to be any assertion of our exclusive economic zone that would prejudice the outcome of those discussions with the Soviets.

Q. I don't see it mentioned specifically, but this would also include oil and gas?

A. The zone will include all living and nonliving resources out to 200 nautical miles beyond the territorial sea of the United States, it will remain at 3 miles.

It would also cover the water column above, in terms of OTEC, that is, Ocean, Thermal Gradiance, Wind, Wave, Energy, when that becomes feasible. So that certainly it would cover oil and gas or any other nonliving resource within that area.

Under the situation that exists at the present time, the United States has jurisdiction to all of the shelf, the natural prolongation of the land mass even that goes beyond 200 miles which traces back to the Truman Proclamation in 1945 [5] and the subsequent development of that under the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act in 1953. [6] That is essentially incorporated within the EEZ proclamation out to the 200 miles.

The only real change, if you're really looking for the specific change is that where the continental shelf terminates before you get out to the 200-mile limit and you have a portion of deep seabed, this would assert the sovereign rights and control over the resources of that portion of the seabed that does not exist now.

In addition to that, as far as fisheries resources are concerned, under the Magnuson Conservation and Management Act of 1976, there is only management of these resources and, of course, as I have said, we are now asserting sovereign rights over those fisheries resources. This, we feel, will be an improved position for the United States in various negotiations that we might be having on fisheries matters with other countries.

Q. In practical terms, what does this mean for foreign fishing rights within U.S. waters, and will the EEZ actually supersede certain aspects of the MCMA?

A. It essentially means virtually no difference as far as the fishing situation is concerned—foreign fishing within U.S. waters, allocation of excess stocks and what not. We do that under the Magnuson Act at the present time. That is going to remain essentially the same as it is now.

I just gave the only real variation as far as the fishery situation was concerned.

I'll take one more question.

Q. I'm a little confused about the relationship of the EEZ to the Law of the Sea treaty because you've said that it parallels in large measure the treaty, and yet you've said—

A. May I correct your—

Q. The EEZ provisions.

A. No. I said that it is consonant with international law and that international law, the balance, is reflected in the EEZ portion of the LOS text. That's quite different than saying that the LOS text is the basis of the assertion of an EEZ. That is not the case. So that is an important distinction and I've tried to make that quite clear.

Q. I note that there are differences. For example, you note that the territorial sea remains at 3 miles and the treaty says it's 12. The treaty system involves a 12-mile territorial sea with notions of transit passage through international straits, et cetera. It sounds like the EEZ proclamation is an effort by the United States not to assure anything off its coast, because, as you said, the United States has most of it already. And on the polymetallic sulphides, the United States has in fact cut the funding for such a program in the U.S. Government for FY 1984. So it's not a coastal justification. Rather, the United States is trying to create a model in customary international law and yet you've said there are 56 states with economic zones of varying claims. And if there is no clear trend in customary international law, why do you say—how do we obtain the consistency with which you're aiming if

[5] Reference is to Policy of the United States With Respect to the Natural Resources of the Subsoil and Sea Bed of the Continental Shelf, Presidential Proclamation No. 2667, September 28, 1945; 59 Stat. 884.

[6] P.L. 212, August 7, 1953; 67 Stat. 462.

the U.S. zone is really just another zone among 57.

A. That's not correct. There is, I think, a clear development within international law that would militate for a zone which is consonant with the provisions of the EEZ in this connection.

The fact that other states have asserted zones that are not consistent with this, of course, we believe is not desirable. Indeed, our position on the recognition of the establishment of other zones by other coastal states would be that they should be consistent with international law, as reflected in the treaty, and they should allow for the rights of other nations within those zones. Indeed, they should not assert rights for jurisdiction beyond what has really been elaborated in the EEZ text of the LOS treaty which is the way these things have developed.

We believe that consistency in the establishment of EEZ's is to be very strongly desired, and that the movement in this direction, we hope, will be helpful in that connection.

Thank you very much.

Statement by President Reagan, March 10, 1983 [7]

"Today I Am Announcing Three Decisions To Promote and Protect the Oceans Interests of the United States . . ."

The United States has long been a leader in developing customary and conventional law of the sea. Our objectives have consistently been to provide a legal order that will, among other things, facilitate peaceful, international uses of the oceans and provide for equitable and effective management and conservation of marine resources. The United States also recognizes that all nations have an interest in these issues.

Last July I announced that the United States will not sign the United Nations Law of the Sea Convention that was opened for signature on December 10. We have taken this step because several major problems in the Convention's deep seabed mining provisions are contrary to the interests and principles of industrialized nations and would not help attain the aspirations of developing countries.

The United States does not stand alone in those concerns. Some important allies and friends have not signed the Convention. Even some signatory States have raised concerns about these problems.

However, the Convention also contains provisions with respect to traditional uses of the oceans which generally confirm existing maritime law and practice and fairly balance the interests of all States.

Today I am announcing three decisions to promote and protect the oceans interests of the United States in a manner consistent with those fair and balanced results in the Convention and international law.

First, the United States is prepared to accept and act in accordance with the balance of interests relating to traditional uses of the oceans—such as navigation and overflight. In this respect, the United States will recognize the rights of other States in the waters off their coasts, as reflected in the Convention, so long as the rights and freedoms of the United States and others under international law are recognized by such coastal States.

Second, the United States will exercise and assert its navigation and overflight rights and freedoms on a worldwide basis in a manner that is consistent with the balance of interests reflected in the Convention. The United States will not, however, acquiesce in unilateral acts of other States designed to restrict the rights and freedoms of the international community in navigation and overflight and other related high seas uses.

Third, I am proclaiming today an Exclusive Economic Zone [8] in which the United States will exercise sovereign rights in living and nonliving resources within 200 nautical miles of its coast. This will provide United States jurisdiction for mineral resources out to 200 nautical miles that are not on the continental shelf. Recently discovered deposits there could be an important future source of strategic minerals.

[8] See infra.

Within this Zone all nations will continue to enjoy the high seas rights and freedoms that are not resource-related, including the freedoms of navigation and overflight. My proclamation does not change existing United States policies concerning the continental shelf, marine mammals and fisheries, including highly migratory species of tuna which are not subject to United States jurisdiction. The United States will continue efforts to achieve international agreements for the effective management of these species. The proclamation also reinforces this government's policy of promoting the United States fishing industry.

While international law provides for a right of jurisdiction over marine scientific research within such a zone, the proclamation does not assert this right. I have elected not to do so because of the United States interest in encouraging marine scientific research and avoiding any unnecessary burdens. The United States will nevertheless recognize the right of other coastal States to exercise jurisdiction over marine scientific research within 200 nautical miles of their coasts, if that jurisdiction is exercised reasonably in a manner consistent with international law.

The Exclusive Economic Zone established today will also enable the United States to take limited additional steps to protect the marine environment. In this connection, the United States will continue to work through the International Maritime Organization and other appropriate international organizations to develop uniform international measures for the protection of the marine environment while imposing no unreasonable burdens on commercial shipping.

The policy decisions I am announcing today will not affect the application of existing United States law concerning the high seas or existing authorities of any United States Government agency.

In addition to the above policy steps, the United States will continue to work with other countries to develop a regime, free of unnecessary political and economic restraints, for mining deep seabed minerals beyond national jurisdiction. Deep seabed mining remains a lawful exercise of the freedom of the high seas open to all nations. The United States will continue to allow its firms to explore for and, when the market permits, exploit these resources.

The administration looks forward to working with the Congress on legislation to implement these new policies.

Proclamation by President Reagan, March 10, 1983 [9]

Establishment of Exclusive Economic Zone of the United States

WHEREAS the Government of the United States of America desires to facilitate the wise development and use of the oceans consistent with international law;

WHEREAS international law recognizes that, in a zone beyond its territory and adjacent to its territorial sea, known as the Exclusive Economic Zone, a coastal State may assert certain sovereign rights over natural resources and related jurisdiction; and

WHEREAS the establishment of an Exclusive Economic Zone by the United States will advance the development of ocean resources and promote the protection of the marine environment, while not affecting other lawful uses of the zone, including the freedoms of navigation and overflight, by other States;

NOW, THEREFORE, I, RONALD REAGAN, by the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the sovereign rights and jurisdiction of the United States of America and confirm also the rights and freedoms of all States within an Exclusive Economic Zone, as described herein.

The Exclusive Economic Zone of the United States is a zone contiguous to the territorial sea, including zones contiguous to the territorial sea of the United States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands (to the extent consistent with the Covenant and the United Nations Trusteeship Agreement), and United States overseas territories and possessions. The Exclusive Economic Zone extends to a distance 200 nautical miles from the baseline from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured. In cases where the maritime boundary with a neighboring State remains to be determined, the boundary of the Exclusive Economic Zone shall be determined by the United States and other State concerned in accordance with equitable principles.

Within the Exclusive Economic Zone, the United States has, to the extent permitted by international law, (a) sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring, exploiting, conserving and managing natural resources, both living and non-living, of the seabed and subsoil and the superjacent waters and with regard to other activities for the economic exploitation and exploration of the zone, such as the production of energy from the water, currents and winds; and (b) jurisdiction with regard to the establishment and use of artificial islands, and installations and structures having economic purposes, and the protection and preservation of the marine environment.

This Proclamation does not change existing United States policies concerning the continental shelf, marine mammals and fisheries, including highly migratory species of tuna which are not subject to United States jurisdiction and require international agreements for effective management.

The United States will exercise these sovereign rights and jurisdiction in accordance with the rules of international law.

Without prejudice to the sovereign rights and jurisdiction of the United States, the Exclusive Economic Zone remains an area beyond the territory and territorial sea of the United States in which all States enjoy the high seas freedoms of navigation, overflight, the laying of submarine cables and pipelines, and other internationally lawful uses of the sea.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this tenth day of March, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighty-three, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and seventh.

U.S. Human Rights Policies and Accomplishments in 1982

Human Rights in International Relations

How to embody the fundamental principles of democratic societies—human rights—in foreign policy has become an especially pressing question for the United States. Because Americans are of many faiths and ethnic heritages, the national identity of the United States is more constituted by its political principles than is that of any other powerful nation. The United States fought its bloodiest war not for territory but to free the slaves. In fact the United States, protected from the harsh necessities of foreign policy by two great oceans only entered world politics in a serious way when impelled to do so by its sense that freedom was threatened. The three times when the United States recommitted itself to active involvement with the outside world—whether in wars for the liberty of Europe or in the Marshall Plan—it has done so because it felt called to the defense of human rights.

The attempt to make foreign policy serve human rights confronts several specific problems that must be faced in developing a policy.

A continuing problem for human rights policy is the fact that it traditionally aims at affecting the domestic behavior of other countries, while governments are reluctant to alter their nation's political system for foreign policy reasons. The leverage that the United States does have is strongest in friendly countries, where we have more access and more influence. Such influence is an important resource in pursuing human rights, but its concentration in friendly countries creates a danger: human rights policy might highlight and punish human rights violations in friendly countries, while giving unfriendly countries immunity. If this took place it would blind men to the complex geography of human rights abuses in the world. Moreover, a nation that came to display a general pattern of undermining or estranging friendly governments would obviously limit its future influence over them, including its influence over their human rights behavior. This is a second problem of human rights—the need to avoid pressing only where our influence is greatest rather than where the abuses are greatest.

There is a danger that human rights policy will become like the labor of Sisyphus because it deals only with effects and not with their causes. To take an example, it is important not only to free political prisoners, but also to encourage conditions in which new political prisoners are not taken. Many, although not all, of the things we consider rights are difficult to implant in adverse conditions. This fact creates the danger that by aiming at too much we will not get what is really possible. The founders of the Weimar Republic, by aiming at a democracy stripped of all the authoritarian features of imperial Germany, created a system so fragile that it was overwhelmed by something wholly barbaric in only 14 years. On the other hand, there still exist in many areas of the world indigenous traditions of decency that coincide in part with the human rights tradition. The best hope for creating the preconditions of effective human rights observance may sometimes lie in working on the basis of these traditions.

For all these reasons, a human rights policy, unless it is very carefully constructed, runs the danger of being ineffective. And if it is ineffective it can also be counterproductive, creating additional resistance to improvement in human rights. It can embitter bilateral relations with other countries, increasing international tension.

Efforts for human rights in the years before 1914 had the advantage that all of the major powers respected, at least in principle, the same conception of human rights. If their practice often failed to live up to their principles, there was a perceived legitimacy to the principles that caused each of these countries to develop in the direction of greater equality before the law and more and more scrupulous adherence to human rights. Because of the fundamental consensus on human rights issues, the great powers that diverged most in practice from the international consensus, such as imperial Russia, did not try to export an alternative ideology.

The fundamental consensus on human rights was broken after World War I by the successive emergence—in Russia, Italy, and Germany—of totalitarian regimes among the major powers. These political systems were visibly founded in opposition to the way of life of the increasingly democratic Western World. They rejected in principle the ideas upon which were based the great movement for human rights after the American and French Revolutions.

The world after 1945 has been characterized by competition between two nations that embody principles—the United States and the Soviet Union. The United States is the nation that has most vigorously undertaken the effort to make human rights a specific part of its foreign policy. The Soviet Union, on the other hand, is ruled by a very small elite through a massive bureaucratic and policy apparatus. Its regime inherits in a modified form the Marxist tradition that reacted against the philosophic ideas on which the original human rights concept was based, and superimposes this on a heritage of absolute monarchy. In contrast to the Western democracies, whose original human rights principles gradually radicalized themselves, producing a greater and greater transformation of social life, the alternative Marxist conception of justice in the USSR was soon withered by tactical compromises with the necessities of absolute rule.

The effect of Soviet foreign policy has not been to encourage human rights. The Soviet Union dominates, without their consent, not only the non-Russian peoples of the former Czarist empire, but also the nations of Eastern Europe. The efforts of the people of East Germany, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, and Poland to create freer and more open systems have all been frustrated by Soviet intervention or pressure. In 1979 the Soviet army invaded Afghanistan to impose a government unacceptable to the overwhelming majority of the Afghan people. In the developing countries, the Soviet Union has a tendency to use its influence to move governments toward political structures of the Soviet type where possible. For example, in Ethiopia, whose current government is already a friend of the Soviet Union in its foriegn policy, there has been persistent Soviet pressure to create a communist party on the Soviet model. Thus a world in which several major powers were in theoretical agreement over human rights has given way to a world in which the two greatest powers are fundamentally divided over this issue.

United States Human Rights Policy

Human rights is at the core of American foreign policy because it is central to America's conception of itself. This nation did not "develop." It was created in order to make real a specific political vision. It follows that "human rights" is not something added on to our foreign policy, but its ultimate purpose: the preservation and promotion of liberty in the world. Freedom is the issue that separates us from the Soviet bloc and embodies America's claim on the imagination of people all over the world.

Our human rights policy has two goals. First, we seek to improve human rights practices in numerous countries—to eliminate torture or brutality, to secure religious freedom, to promote free elections, and the like. A foreign policy indifferent to these issues would not appeal to the idealism of Americans, would be amoral, and would lack public support. Moreover, these are pragmatic, not utopian, actions for the United States. Our most stable, reliable allies are democracies. Our reputation among the people in important countries that are dictatorships will suffer if we come to be associated not with liberty, but with despotism. Often the people whose rights we are defending are the national leaders of future years.

As to the question of tactics, the Reagan administration's test is effectiveness. With friendly countries, we prefer to use diplomacy, not public pronouncements. We seek not to isolate them for their injustices and thereby render ourselves ineffective, but to use our influence to effect desirable change. Our aim is to achieve results, not to make self-satisfying but ineffective gestures.

But the second goal of our human rights policy sometimes can conflict with this search for effectiveness: we seek also a public association of the United States with the cause of liberty. This is an eminently practical goal: our ability to win international cooperation and defeat anti-American propaganda will be harmed if we seem indifferent to the fate of liberty. Friendly governments are often susceptible to quiet diplomacy, and we therefore use it rather than public denunciations. But if we never appear seriously concerned about human rights in friendly countries, our policy will seem one-sided and cynical. Thus, while the Soviet bloc presents the most serious long-term human rights problem, we cannot let it falsely appear that this is our only human rights concern. So a human rights policy does inescapably mean trouble—for example, from friendly governments if the United States Government places pressure upon them, or from the American people if their government appears not to be doing so. Yet a human rights policy embodies our deepest convictions about political life, and our interests: the defense and expansion of liberty.

Our human rights policy also has two sides, the negative and the positive. The negative side is embodied in the way we oppose (through act or word) specific human rights violations in the short term. The positive side is strongly emphasized by the Reagan administration in which we seek over the long term to help democracy, the surest safeguard of human rights. It is a fact that most democracies have excellent human rights records; nothing is as likely as democracy to produce this result.

President Reagan has made the long-term development of democracy throughout the world a central goal of our foreign policy. Too often our human rights policy has been reactive or negative, responding to events by punishing people for bad behavior. The President wishes to go beyond this to an active, positive human rights policy. He outlined his conception in a speech to Parliament in London last June [2] where he announced plans for two conferences that have since been held in Washington: a conference of scholars and experts on the democratization of Communist countries, and a conference on free elections which included political leaders and elections officials from countries throughout the world. In addition, there is now underway a bipartisan study of how the United States can do more to promote democracy, and whether the growth of democratic institutions such as free elections, a free press, free labor unions, or an independent judiciary can be promoted through an appropriate combination of public and private effort. Recommendations for programs are expected this spring. Such programs would by their very nature need to be insulated from United States Government control, and would have to be responsive to the needs and desires of men and women who seek democracy for their own countries.

At the same time, the United States Government has assembled proposals for programs in support of democracy. The executive branch will soon be submitting these proposals for the consideration of Congress. They contain such items as support for free labor movements abroad; working with the AFL–CIO; expanded visitor exchanges of individuals in all age groups; proposed monetary support for publishing and distributing literature and teaching materials on democracy. Also suggested are support for the free press in the form of increased journalists' exchange and training; and support for organizations whose goal is protecting proponents of democracy, whether through observing trials, strengthening judicial procedures, or building intellectual and popular support for democratic institutions and procedures.

Obviously, the positive course of human rights policy is not a substitute for an immediate and active response, including sanctions, for human rights violations when they occur. But the administration believes that we should treat not only the symptoms but the disease—that we should not only respond to human rights violations but also should work to establish democratic systems in which human rights violations are less likely to occur.

Positive policy of this kind will be aided by the genuine echo that the concept of human rights evokes around much of the world, and by the fact that no other conception of political justice has been able to win as much legitimacy over the last 200 years. In aiding this movement, we will not be struggling alone, but assisting the most powerful current of history during the last 200 years. This administration is committed to such a positive effort in support of human rights.

The Congress has already established one human rights program on the positive side. Section 116(e) of the Foreign Assistance Act provides Agency for International Development (AID) funding for programs and activities which will encourage or promote increased adherence to civil and political rights in countries eligible for United States bilateral assistance. In Fiscal Year 1982 AID funded activities of $1,645,250 in 22 countries. Activities included the education and research program of the Inter-American Institute of Human Rights in Costa Rica; support for international observers for the March 1982 elections in El Salvador; strengthening the institutional base of the Indonesian legal system; legal education programs in the Philippines; research on human rights and a public education campaign on civil and political rights by the Liberian Constitution Commission; and publication of the newly revised Zairian Penal Code.

Present United States human rights policy gives special attention to encouraging major improvements in the observance of human rights over the long term. But it does not neglect the simple imperative of responding to the fact of suffering. The United States is a major haven for refugees and the major contributor to the work of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, giving $121.9 million in FY 1982. In FY 1982 the United States contributed over $14 million to the International Committee of the Red Cross for its programs on behalf of prisoners, missing persons, and civilians in wartime.

In the pursuit of its human rights policy the United States uses a wide range of means. Decision on foreign assistance provided by the United States take human rights conditions into account. The transfer of police and military equipment is carefully reviewed in order to avoid identifying the United States with violations of human rights. In addition, human rights policy employs a varied mix of diplomatic tools: frank discussions with foreign officials; meeting with victims of human rights abuses; and, where private diplomacy is unavailing or unavailable, public statements of concern. These instruments are applied in a manner that takes into account a country's history, culture, and current political environment, and recognizes that human rights concerns must be balanced with other fundamental interests. This administration has used all of these instruments at one time or another.

Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs (Abrams), February 8, 1983 (Extract) [3]

What's New in the Human Rights Report for 1982

This is the second country report on human rights practices that has been compiled fully under the Reagan administration. [4] It is longer than last year's by roughly 200 pages, and we hope it is more informative as well.

The introduction this year [5] repeats, as I think some of you will have noticed, the central portions of last year's on the philosophical underpinnings of our human rights policy. We reread those sections and found them utterly persuasive and decided to include them again.

[3] Source: Department of State files. Abrams made the statement at the outset of a Department of State press briefing, which he and Charles Fairbanks, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, conducted beginning at 10:04 a.m.

What is new in the introduction is the last part of it, which is an effort to describe how we put together the report and the problems that anyone has, and that we had, in putting together such a report—difficulties in maintaining consistency, difficulties in getting information on certain countries. We wanted to try and give a sense of how we put the report together and what we think the problems with it are.

As to the reports themselves, I think like last year, we have tried to avoid any kind of sensationalism in the tone. We have tried to avoid, to some extent, evaluative adjectives because that's not the purpose of the report. The purpose is to compile facts and report on the facts of the situation to Congress.

I just wanted to make one point about the length of the individual reports. They don't measure anything in particular by the length, the number of pages. To some extent, the length reflects the availability of information; and on some of the worst human rights violators, because they are closed societies, there is very little information available. In other cases, the length may reflect, at least in part, the degree of interest in this country, in the country in question; but length, per se, does not reflect the performance of the country in question with respect to human rights.

Another change in the report this year is the inclusion of separate reports on the Baltic States—Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. In previous years, those had been included under the report on the Soviet Union. It was pointed out to us last year that that was an anomaly because the United States, along with a number of its Western allies—Britain, France, Canada, and Germany—does not recognize the forceable incorporation of the Baltic States into the Soviet Union. So why, we were asked, did we not have separate reports on those countries?

We thought that to be a very good question, so this year we do have separate reports. They follow the report on the USSR.

We continue this year with a strong emphasis on political rights and on giving as much information as possible on the question of political rights. First, on participation in governing the country, we have tried to indicate when that participation is real, and when it is not. For example, there is a great difference between membership which can even be imposed in a mass organization organized by, run, and controlled by a government, on the one hand, and real political participation in an open political system in which people do in fact choose the rulers of the country. So we've tried to give some information about what the real form of political participation is.

We have tried to give more information, as we could, about labor unions this year, because it is our sense that trade union movements in a country are both a measure of and a means of political participation by the peoples of various countries. We've tried to show how free the trade union movements are or are not.

We've tried to indicate who actually rules the country in question. For example, we have tried to go beyond saying, "This country is a one-party state." There are some one-party states that have a large bureaucratic party that really does control power. There are other one-party states where, in fact, one man really rules the country entirely on his own. There are others where a small ethnic group or a clique rules the country. We've tried to distinguish those, and give a sense of who is actually in charge: where does power really lie.

We've tried to give more information about elections, going beyond whether elections exist, and saying how free they are. That is, are there multiple candidates so that people actually get a choice? Are the returns fraudulent or are they accurate?

In the case of parliaments or legislative assemblies, we've tried to give an indication of whether they are real. For example, do they ever reject legislation that is put before them? Are all votes unanimous, or are they real, deliberative, and decisionmaking bodies? We've tried to give more information on the independence of judicial systems and on their ability to check government power.

In the area of free speech, we've given, as has been true in past years, information on how free speech is, and we've tried to cover a somewhat new area this year, namely private speech. That is, it is one thing to discuss the ability of people to discuss political matters in public; it is another, and an interesting question, as to whether they are even free to discuss political matters in private. For example, does the government run such a large network of informers that people will not even feel free to talk about politics in their own homes or in a friend's house? We've tried to give information about that.

Finally, we've tried to give information about the press, as in previous years. As with these other items, we've tried to be more precise about the condition of the press. That is, for example, who owns it? Is it government-owned, or is it not? What is the degree of government control? What is the amount of censorship of the press? We've tried to give a sense of just how free the press is in each of these countries.

Address by the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs (Abrams) Before the East-West Round Table of New York, April 19, 1983 [6]

Human Rights Problems: Complexity and Communism

I am delighted to be here tonight to discuss the Reagan administration's human rights policy.

In my view U.S. human rights policy has two specific goals: to improve human rights conditions in a large number of places around the world, so as to benefit the people who live in those places; and to make clear the continuing commitment of the United States to the cause of liberty throughout the world. These goals are, of course, not inconsistent; indeed, they are inseparable. Yet, in practice, formulating a policy which achieves both is extraordinarily difficult.

I would like to suggest that it is extraordinarily difficult for two very different reasons and then to discuss both. The first reason I will call complexity; and the second I will call communism.

With respect to complexity, I refer to the great difficulty in determining what U.S. Government actions will in fact help achieve human rights in a large number of specific cases. In a sense, the easiest aspect of this problem is the choice between public pressure and quiet diplomacy. One must gauge which, in the specific country in question, is, for example, more likely to get more people released from jail next week or more likely to prevent the torture of political prisoners. This is a tactical question, but one which quite obviously can be very difficult.

I think our general views on this are by now clear. We believe that where there are good relations between a foreign government and the U.S. Government, and our influence is considerable, we should use it first through diplomatic channels. Among the advantages of this route are the careful control over it we can exercise; the fact that issues of American arrogance or neocolonialism, or a foreign government's sensitivity to public pressure and to its own sovereignty, are minimized; and the fact that we avoid adding inadvertently to any campaign aimed at delegitimizing or destabilizing the government in question.

I do not suggest that a campaign of silence will produce very much but those who urge that the State Department engage often in public denunciations mistake, I think, its proper role. I do not suggest limits on public discussion by Congress or by human rights organizations—merely by the Executive. Clearly pressure from the public, nongovernmental organizations, the press, and most of all the Congress are useful if diplomatic pressure is to be fully effective. But I would caution against a confusion of roles here.

The question of what U.S. Government actions are helpful becomes even more difficult if one is asking, not how to get a few prisoners out of jail, but rather how to evolve a system in which no political prisoners are taken. What should the United States actually do to help Argentina return from military rule to civilian rule? Is there an American role in the negotiations between the multipartidara and the military? Precisely how should we use our influence in South Africa so that that country evolves in the direction of racial peace and democracy rather than in the direction of bloodshed and repression? What should be our role with respect to National Party politics? Should we attempt to help a reform coalition in South Africa—or are their reforms too pale to lead to any real recognition of the human rights of South African blacks? Considering conditions in Zaire, how can the United States best encourage the development of democratic institutions there?

What influence should tribal divisions, as in Nigeria or Namibia, have over the transition to democracy? To address these issues, we need (to borrow cavalierly from Samuel Huntington) an analysis of the evils of the society, a sense of the goals of reform and of the character of the future society, and a sense of strategy for getting from here to there. Only thus do we know what we are for, beyond saying we are for liberty.

If these questions seem hopelessly complicated that is because they are. They cannot be answered without the closest study of each of the societies in question—and in addition concentrated attention on successful examples of political development elsewhere in the world—from Turkey to Brazil to Meiji, Japan to Mexico to DeGaulle's Fifth Republic. And they will not always be answered correctly. The human rights problem is so complex that mistakes will inevitably be made.

I would suggest that a policy seriously dedicated to helping expand freedom throughout the world must address all of these complexities.

We must learn to deal with the frustration that flows from partial success in our efforts to improve respect for basic human rights. Limited success is frustrating in human rights, as it is not elsewhere. In other areas of foreign policy, any advance is a gain. In human rights, partial success is always shadowed by the fact that any remaining human rights violation is still unconditionally repugnant. And, in human rights policy, we are dealing with limited success almost by definition. Our human rights policy is concerned about a situation precisely because there are serious abuses there, abuses that are not superficial and therefore not easily removed.

Through the historic encounter of America with human rights problems, there have been two traditions of response to this frustration. The first tradition has been the dominant one because it accords with American ways of doing things in other areas. When Americans are concerned about righting a moral wrong, we are traditionally willing to work and to sacrifice to achieve our ideals. We generally commit ourselves to effective action on behalf of our principles. We are willing to make the intellectual effort to understand a complicated reality when we want to change it. We are willing to commit resources. We are willing to give of our own labor and efforts. And, when it is a question of diminishing suffering and injustice, we stick to an effort in spite of complications and difficulties.

This administration believes that U.S. human rights policy must be carried out in the spirit of this dominant American tradition. We must be hardworking, hardheaded, and realistic. Our efforts for human rights should understand the reality we are facing honestly and clearly, and deal with it by an active policy which employs all the leverage and influence we are able to muster. In human rights as in other areas of foreign policy, we will not achieve our goals if policy is reactive or passive, or results in our avoiding problems because they are difficult or frustrating.

There has been another, less influential, American tradition of response to frustration in the face of a complex moral task. In the 1840's and 1850's, this tradition was represented by the attitude of some extreme abolitionists in the face of the entrenched evil of slavery. This group of abolitionists was quite willing to see the secession of the slave states from the Union. Then the United States would no longer be contaminated by any complicity in the evil of slavery. The evil itself, of course, would have continued unabated, and the breakup of the Union would have ended the existing leverage for restricting slavery. This tradition saw that one way to avoid being implicated in a moral evil is to place yourself in a position where you cannot do anything about it.

Abraham Lincoln, the statesman who achieved the end of slavery, rejected this approach. He rejected it because he could not admit that the surrender of hope and effort ought to be the sign of moral nobility. He preferred to change the world, even at the cost of the compromises and contradictions every historian recounts.

READEX FICHE

The second tradition rejected by Lincoln reappears in our time in one aspect of human rights policy. This aspect concentrates on acts of abstention and withdrawal. That is, proper human rights policy consists of terminating economic assistance to countries where there are continuing problems, of not giving them diplomatic support, of not voting for multilateral loans to them, of not licensing crime control equipment to them, of not supplying military assistance and training, and so forth.

I do not disparage these specific instruments of human rights policy. They have an important place as part of an integrated policy, and the Reagan administration has used them along with other methods of diplomacy. But if abstention and withdrawal become the whole of our human rights policy, that policy will be both ineffective and unworthy of us.

There is a view that the most heroic act we can do for freedom and justice is to keep our hands clean and sit back feeling good about ourselves. It is difficult to believe that this course exhausts the idealism of the American people. Is this the most sophisticated policy we can evolve for human rights? Human rights deserves more. Human rights deserves a policy that grapples with complexity, is willing to make an effort, and one that is patient and determined rather than fitful and episodic.

This is the moral outlook that guides the policy of the Reagan administration. We want to improve conditions in the world where we can. To do so, we must deal with countries as they are. We must work with the existing facts and with hard cases. To flee these cases would be to evade our responsibility. To face them, to understand them, to roll up our sleeves and build the means for changing them is in the best tradition of America.

Let me turn now for a moment to the other problem I mentioned before—the problem of communism. Or perhaps more accurately, of communism and of Soviet power. To begin with the latter, the USSR and the United States are by far the world's strongest powers. The United States is a free country and its influence is, all other things being equal, in favor of democracy. The vast power of the Soviet Union, on the other hand, is exercised to confuse human rights issues in international discourse, to install despotic regimes in power and support others whose crimes have deprived them of any support from their population—witness Afghanistan and Cambodia. Some of this role is shaped by ideology, some by cynical power-politics. When the United States, disgusted by human rights violations in Ethiopia, terminated our military aid to Ethiopia (FYI: under Carter), it was the Soviet Union that stepped in with billions of dollars in arms and with Cuban regiments. We are seeing the same cynicism today with Cuba and Suriname. Cuba, seeing a weak dictator who has just started the practice of killing his opponents, immediately sees this as an opportunity to gain—not to protest, but to develop a cozy relationship. The conclusion we have to draw is that the East-West struggle matters a great deal for human rights. Let me acknowledge right now that I take the comment that this administration puts human rights policy in an East-West framework to be descriptive rather than critical.

There is another problem with communism itself, rather than Soviet power. Many regimes violate human rights. But Communist regimes tend to export their human rights violations. If you compare Haiti and Cuba, Nicaragua and Guatemala, Vietnam and the Philippines, this is the conclusion to which you will be forced. In addition, Communist regimes tend to be much more enduring than non-Communist dictatorships. It is a fact, in spite of the magnificent experiments of Poland and Czechoslovakia, crushed by Soviet pressure, that no Communist ruling elite has relinquished power since 1919. So Communist regimes are the source of particular human rights problems. This does not mean we judge a non-Communist human rights violation less harshly. It is the policy of the U.S. Government to respond to all human rights violations as best we can, no matter who does them. But it does make a difference when we confront complexity—when we don't know what will happen if a government falls.

As we see in Nicaragua, a crucial question which we need to ask about every government which abuses human rights is what the alternatives are. Surely this is one lesson we can learn from Vietnam. Just as the opposition in Vietnam consisted of a number of Communist and non-Communist elements, so it does in El Salvador; yet we are persuaded that should the left come to power there can be no doubt that the armed elements tied closely to the Soviet Union—and hawking the Soviet propaganda line on all international issues—would in fact take over. In the light of our experience, even a highly imperfect regime may well give a much better prospect of democratization than would the Communist regime that might follow it. It is therefore no contribution to the cause of human rights to replace a regime we can work with and improve, with a Communist regime.

What this means is that the United States is at times reluctantly compelled to support regimes which abuse human rights, because we think that their replacements would be much worse for the cause of human rights, and because we think that American (and other) pressure can greatly improve these regimes over time.

It is clear that this policy of resisting Soviet expansion and the expansion of Communist systems throughout the world has subjected us to great criticism, because in pursuit of this policy we sometimes work closely with regimes which abuse human rights. How does this fit, we are asked, with our stated goals of seeking real human rights improvements and seeking to make clear the continuing American commitment to liberty? I should think my answers to this are obvious. In the real world the choice is frequently not between good and bad but between bad and worse or, perhaps more accurately, bad but improvable, or worse and permanent. To prevent virtually any country from being taken over by a Communist regime tied to the Soviet Union is in our view a very real victory for the cause of human rights. Of course, it is very difficult to demonstrate to a large number of people that we are committed to the cause of liberty when we have good relations with a repressive regime which we seldom criticize publicly. I don't deny the seriousness of this problem, but I want to make clear why I think it exists. I think it exists because so many people in the West will no longer grant the moral imperative of resisting the advance of communism. In Europe, for example, this produces a particular anomaly: one meets many people who will grant that the political distinction between West and East, the distinction between the Western political systems and the Soviet political system, is that between freedom and its absence, and is therefore a moral distinction. Yet many of the same people refuse to grant the same moral dimension to the struggle to resist the expansion of that very same Soviet system throughout the world. It is here where we disagree. In my view, resistance to the expansion of communism is essential to a human rights policy.

In Vietnam and in Nicaragua, we were told that the government we supported was corrupt and oppressive, and that the other side was the progressive side, and would respect democracy. We were told that human rights would gain if the other side won. We now hear this argument again about El Salvador—indeed in Europe it has been thrown at me daily.

This is in my view blindness. How many times must we learn this lesson? This much I strongly urge upon you: that it is no part of a human rights policy to allow the governments of El Salvador or Honduras, to take two current examples, to be replaced by Communist dictatorships. To acquiesce in this, to withdraw our support from these governments at this junction, would make a mockery of our concern for human rights. For our goal is not purity; we do not live in Utopia. Our goal is effectiveness in a violent and bitterly divided area of the world. Once again, I would never argue that all those opposed to these regimes are Communists. I do argue, however, that the extremists would take power, and regimes would emerge which would impose Communist dictatorships, with all that that means for human rights.

Human rights policy is, inevitably, a difficult mixing of the highest idealism, with practical politics. It isn't easy, to practice or indeed even to explain. Yet the marriage of ideals and politics is an old American practice—as old as the country itself. We are committed to this effort, as the President has made clear time after time. Human rights policy has always been, and remains, a central element of American foreign policy. And in our part of the 20th century, resistance to communism must be a central part of any sensible human rights policy.

Statement by President Reagan, December 9, 1983 [1]

"As Americans, It's Our Responsibility To Speak Out Against Blatant Affronts to Human Rights"

I thank you all for being here today to underscore our national recognition of human rights. The degree of freedom in our country is something of which Americans are rightfully proud. Unlike many other countries which find their cohesion in cultural and social traditions, the citizens of our country find their unity and their heritage in the liberty that is shared by people with diverse cultural backgrounds.

When Americans think about the nature of human rights, we begin with what Abraham Lincoln called "the definition and axioms of free society contained in the Declaration of Independence." Well, that testament of liberty declares that all men are created equal and are endowed by their Creator with inalienable rights.

To secure these rights, it states "governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Well, those words reveal the meaning of human rights and our philosophy of liberty that is the essence of America.

Sometimes we in free countries forget the richness of that precious possession. Our human rights are respected, so our freedom is almost indivisible—invisible, I should say.

There are no walls, no troops or guns to prevent us from traveling. There are no guards at our churches or spies in our congregations. And there are no censors at the newspapers or universities. People who live in tyranny, however, can see freedom much more clearly. It shines like a candle in the midst of darkness and America's freedom shines through a world of stormy seas, giving hope to tens of millions of people for a better way of life.

As Americans, it's our responsibility to speak out against blatant affronts to human rights. Yes, we must and we will speak out against the incarceration of Soviet dissidents in psychiatric wards, against the barbaric persecution of the members of the Bahai faith in Iran, against the racial injustice of the apartheid system in South Africa and against the persecution of the Catholic Church and the Solidarity labor movement in Poland.

Just a personal note of regret, it's particularly unfortunate that Solidarity leader Lech Walesa, who has been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for his valiant efforts to achieve peaceful reconciliation within Poland feels that he cannot leave his own country to accept that prize out of concern that he would not be permitted to return.

We cannot believe in human rights and ignore the activities of death squads in some Central American countries, the persecution of the churches and to the Miskito indians in Nicaragua, and the resurgence of repression against national and religious groups in the Soviet Union, including Jews, Baptists, Lithuanian Catholics, Central Asian Moslems, and even members of the Russian Orthodox clergy.

We will, of course, maintain a strong defense, but an equally potent weapon against tyranny is to proclaim the truth. I think one of our great failings has been permitting leftist dictatorships to seize the initiative in the international debate. The adversaries of freedom allocate enormous resources to promote their brutal systems and propagate blatant lies. But we in the democracies, in comparison, have spent far too little to offer the world our message of democracy, human rights, and truth.

To turn this situation around, I've made supportive democracy a central goal of American foreign policy. And, specifically, to correct these communication gaps, we are significantly expanding the international broadcasting capabilities of the United States. We are strengthening oper-

Saint John told us, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." Well, in many countries people aren't even allowed to read the Bible. It is up to us to make sure the message of hope and salvation gets through.

You know, I should have brought it with me, although maybe some of you have seen it, but I have a little book, about that big, about that thick, that contains a verse or two, printed in small type in that little thing, from the Bible. It was smuggled out of Russia and was finally delivered to me as an example of what they do just to try and cling to their faith and belief, that when someone has a Bible, they then take just a verse so that everyone can have at least some words—a few words of the scripture and in something that can be easily hidden. And that, when we think of our own freedom, makes it very evident.

I've done something else—I have to interject here, although this is not an occasion for humor. But, I've had a kind of a hobby, lately, of collecting by way of dissidents, stories that are told behind some of those iron curtains and those iron walls by the people themselves, showing their own cynicism about the system under which they are forced to live.

And one recently that I heard had to do with three dogs that were having a conversation: an American dog, a Polish dog, and a Russian dog. And the American dog was telling him about how well he barks, and that in our country his master gives him some meat. The Polish dog says "What's meat?" And the Russian dog says, "What's bark?" (Applause)

But seriously, all of us who live in freedom are linked in spirit with those brave men and women being persecuted for demanding their rights or struggling to establish democracy.

With us today in the front rows and on stage are a number of courageous individuals who have suffered for their belief. in human rights and democracy. They come from countries which differ markedly from each other, and yet they are all heroes of the same cause. Their devotion to political and religious liberties unites them as it unites all of us who are committed to the freedom of mankind.

I note with sadness and concern that one hero not with us today, Dr. Andrei Sakharov, is reported to be seriously ill. This good and courageous man has struggled for years on behalf of human rights and he's now banished to the city of Gorki supposedly free. He just can't leave Gorki. It's my hope that in the name of humanity the Soviet authorities will permit this noble individual to live his life in freedom and dignity.

In honoring these heroes today, we proclaim our confidence that good and decent people will triumph over evil. Dictatorships can pass away. On the right we've seen it happen in recent years, in Spain, in Portugal, in Greece, in Argentina.

On the left, totalitarian ideologies that brutalize human beings rebuild mankind into that which it is not are destined to fail. Totalitarianism on the left, just like Nazism before it, will be discarded by a disgusted humanity. Much depends on us, but we can be confident that the tide of history is indeed running on the side of freedom.

This month marks the anniversary of two milestones in mankind's journey to freedom. December 15th is the 192d anniversary of our Bill of Rights and 35 years ago, recoiling from the horror and the destruction of World War II, on December 10th the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Those of us who went through that terrible conflict saw the Declaration as an important international standard, something that could help build a better world. Well, today we reaffirm our commitment to the ideals expressed in the Declaration.

To commemorate these advances in freedom, I am declaring December 10 Human Rights Day, the week beginning December 10 as Human Rights Week, and December 15 Bill of Rights Day. Let this be a call to action for all Americans. We must rededicate ourselves to respect at home for those fundamental human rights which form the basis of our self-definition as a people and a nation. We must also assure those brave men and women struggling for democracy around the world that we will be true to ourselves by supporting our common cause.

I thank you very much. God bless all of you and, with that said, I will sign the declaration.

Proposed Sanctions Against the Hiring of Illegal Aliens

. . . . . .

The conditions which have led to our present problems in immigration are neither new or unusual. The United States has for many years presented an attractive lure to people from much of the world. The individual freedoms of its residents and the opportunity to better one's place in life has encouraged immigration since the very beginning of our country. Because of this, we have developed as a nation of immigrants with all the benefits which people from every part of the world can provide.

We must recognize, however, that there are limits to the number of immigrants which the country can reasonably accommodate and most of all, immigration must be a controlled process accomplished under the provisions of law. The Immigration Reform Act of 1983 [2] recognizes the historical role of the United States as the receiver of immigrants while placing the necessary controls on immigration.

As stated before, we believe the legislation achieves the balance necessary for fair and controlled immigration.

Through the placing of sanctions on the hiring of illegal aliens or those who are not authorized to work in the United States, the bill addresses one of the primary reasons aliens enter illegally or after legal arrival, violate the conditions of their admission.

By providing for the legalization of aliens who have resided in our society for several years, the bill recognizes the reality of this situation and presents a humanitarian and realistic approach. To attempt a mass deportation or to ignore this population as we enforce employer sanctions would be disruptive and contrary to our democratic principles.

The bill recognizes that employers may have legitimate short term needs for foreign workers especially as employers sanctions are implemented in agriculture or other industries and provides the means by which workers may be allowed to enter if their entry will not create a disadvantage for domestic workers.

Although we have discussed many of these points before, I would now like to comment on the specific provisions of S.529.

While the actual number of illegal aliens is unknown, the most frequently cited numbers range from 3.5 to 6 million. The presence of large numbers of illegal aliens in the United States and the continuing entry of others is an unacceptable situation and has destroyed much of the confidence and respect which the law deserves. Immigration must be a controlled and orderly process which reflects the best interests of our nation.

A cornerstone of the bill is the sanctions which would be imposed on the knowing hiring of aliens not authorized to work in the United States. Although there are other reasons for illegal immigration, employment is the most compelling. We feel that this provision is absolutely essential to gaining control of our borders; only through this means can we remove the magnet which attracts so many illegal aliens to our country.

The bill makes it unlawful to knowingly hire, recruit, or refer for employment an alien not authorized to be employed in the United States, and makes it unlawful to continue to employ an alien hired after the enactment of the statute knowing that the alien is not authorized to work in the United States. The bill requires that a person who hires, recruits, or refers an individual for employment must complete a form for each individual and attest under penalty of perjury that the person's right to be employed has been determined through an examination of documents which identify the individual and show that he or she is eligible to be employed in the United States. An individual who seeks employment in the United States must complete a form and attest under penalty of perjury that he or she is a United States citizen, an alien who has been admitted for lawful permanent residence, or an alien who has been authorized for employment.

The administration believes that these provisions are appropriate as a means of controlling illegal immigration to the United States while safeguarding civil rights. Equality of employment opportunity for United States citizens and lawful permanent residents is not diminished by this bill. The recordkeeping requirements of the bill balance the burden of additional paperwork with the need to provide employers with a means to prove that they have complied in good faith.

Reservations on Proposed Immigration Reform and Control Legislation

. . . . . .

We continue to believe in the need for measures to regularize the status of some of those in the United States illegally, to reduce the pull factors that induce such illegal migration, to expedite administrative procedures relating to admission, exclusion and deportation, and to embody the solutions to the problems resulting from illegal migration in an overall package approach.

In connection with the regularization of status proposal, I would also note that it would serve not only our own interests but would diminish the concerns expressed by Mexico and other countries respecting the circumstances of their nationals in the United States.

I shall defer to the views of the agencies more directly affected by many of the issues covered in this legislation and address primarily those items of special interest to the Department of State in the substantive sense.

We sympathize with the quite reasonable desire to have better control over the number of people coming permanently to the United States. However—and in the context of the Attorney General's qualifier [4]—we have not lost our substantial reservations about the wisdom and practicality of an overall cap on migration that includes immediate relatives.

We also hold the view that legal immigration is not such an immediate problem as illegal immigration. As opportunities for immigration by family members of resident aliens decrease under the numerical limit, there would be a natural, but in our view, improper incentive to naturalization solely to confer immigration benefits on relatives. This would lead, we believe, to a consequent increase, not only in immediate relative immigration, but also in demand for immigration by other relatives of U.S. citizens, such as unmarried and married sons and daughters.

In short, we foresee substantive repercussions arising from these proposals, although they would pose no practical problems for us in terms of implementation.

Such a diminution in family reunification immigration will also put the United States in an awkward position with respect to the Helsinki accords. As opportunities for Eastern Bloc relatives to be reunited in this country diminish, our credibility on the issue of divided families would also diminish.

We appreciate the general validity of the user fee concept. However, the Department has grave foreign relations and other reservations about the imposition of such fees at U.S. land border ports of entry.

The mere imposition of such fees would itself almost certainly appear to Mexico and Canada as inconsistent with the spirit of cross-border cooperation which the President has emphasized.

This reaction, based on a matter of principle, would at a minimum be another irritant in bilateral relations and could lead to reciprocal action.

In addition to these foreign relations concerns, we are disturbed by the essential impracticality of this provision and its seeming unfairness.

We are convinced it is not reasonably manageable. It is obvious that a simple unmanned toll-booth operation would not suffice, not the least of its shortcomings being that it could account only for the passage of the vehicle and not for the number of passengers, let alone their nationality.

Thus, the mechanics of collecting fees at land border ports could well create unthinkable delays in the inspection system itself, further exacerbating the negative reaction in the neighboring countries.

There would also probably be criticism of the requirement that aliens be charged the full costs of installations which are also used by U.S. citizens.

We welcome the consensus on the need for special asylum officers and are pleased that the bill calls for a consultative role for the Department of State. We believe State's expertise on foreign aspects bearing on asylum questions is essential to their proper adjudication.

We think we understand the motivations for the proposed change in the adjustment of status provisions, but feel it necessary to question their practicality. One can lose lawful status by means other than unauthorized employment. Unintentional overstays are not a root problem. Unauthorized employment is.

With regard to the students provision, we find little merit in dropping the distinction between private students and sponsored exchange visitors. We note also the contrast between our usual emphasis on family reunification and the waiver provision, which would make it possible for certain persons needed by industry to acquire resident status without residing abroad for 2 years, but would withhold that opportunity from the spouses of U.S. citizens and resident aliens.

We have no objections to the proposal to benefit certain international civil servants, their children, and surviving spouses who have long resided in the United States.

Of course, of particular importance to State is the nonimmigrant visa waiver provision. We are prepared to accept the concept of a pilot program, limited in both duration and the number of countries.

We are, however, disturbed by the failure to use a 2-year average as the qualifier for the program. There are economical and political events that skew data from one year to the next for reasons not bearing on whether a country's nationals are good nonimmigrant risks.

Use of only the prior year's data could result in such aberrations as a country not being found eligible which should be or, worse, being found eligible when it should not be.

We recognize that some of the proposals about which we have expressed reservations are predicated on philosophical issues on which reasonable persons can honestly differ. We believe, however, that some may be essentially technical or drafting matters and would be pleased to work with the committee members and staff to develop modifications that would be mutually satisfactory.

1984 Refugee Assistance Budget

. . . . . .

Our budget request for fiscal year 1984 is $344.5 million. The fiscal year 1984 request is a decrease of $50.0 million from the fiscal year 1983 Continuing Resolution level of funding. Half of this decrease has been made possible by the success of our efforts to reduce refugee admissions to the United States, while continuing to respond to humanitarian needs and U.S. foreign policy interests and responsibilities.

The other half we credit to the absence of such large-scale refugee crises as were experienced in past years, such as the surge of Vietnamese boat people and the Somalia crisis, as well as policy and management initiatives that are containing or reducing the costs of responding to ongoing refugee relief problems. Furthermore, we are pleased with the progress in our efforts to "internationalize" the world's response to refugee problems—that is, to encourage broader participation by other nations in supporting refugee programs, especially other developed countries which are able to carry a bigger share of the burden. We remain aware that the decrease in refugee program needs can be reversed overnight should major conflicts in any of the troubled areas of our world generate new refugee problems.

Our budget request for fiscal year 1984 is presented in four major subdivisions. The first area is refugee admissions, with a request of $117.0 million. This figure is about 34 percent of our total request and a decrease of about $25 million from the fiscal year 1983 funding level. The request is based on the admission of 72,000 refugees to the U.S. in fiscal year 1984, representing a reduction of 18,000 from the fiscal year 1983 consultations level, and one-third the 217,000 consultations level of fiscal year 1981. The 72,000 projected admissions are divided among 46,000 East Asians, 15,000 from the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, 6,000 from the Near East and South Asia, 2,000 from the Western Hemisphere, and 3,000 from Africa.

Activities required to admit refugees include four areas. First, we request $20.5 million for processing of refugees prior to entry. This includes funding the Joint Voluntary Agency Representatives for processing services in Southeast Asia, Pakistan, and Africa, as well as funding for the voluntary agencies in Europe. Also included are funding of some necessary management services by the voluntary agencies in the U.S., such as a data information system on refugee admissions and American Red Cross tracing activities.

Second, we are requesting about $46.6 million for capitalization of transportation loans through the Intergovernmental Committee for Migration for refugees admitted to the U.S. This takes into account a projected $8 million in loan repayments in fiscal year 1984.

Reception and placement grants to voluntary agencies which provide initial reception and placement services to newly admitted refugees is the third area, with a request of about $39.5 million. This level provides for a small increase over the per-capita amounts budgeted in fiscal year 1983 in order to cover the effects of inflation.

Finally, we are requesting about $10.4 million for the training and orientation of refugees admitted to the United States. We have already in place a sound program of English language and cultural orientation training for Indochinese refugees awaiting admission in the Refugee Processing Centers. We are requesting funding of program improvements to address the additional training needs of Indochinese refugees least likely to succeed in the United States—those who are preliterate or who have very low levels of learning. In addition, we propose extending our training programs to some other groups of refugees where economically feasible. It is our conclusion, after careful investigation, that the very small program increases in this area will result in significant savings in domestic welfare costs because refugees enter much better prepared for life in the United States, especially to take entry-level jobs.

Funding requested for relief assistance to refugees overseas in fiscal year 1984 is $197.5 million, about 57 percent of our total request and a decrease of $25.8 million from the fiscal year 1983 funding level. Three years ago, the composition of our request was about two-thirds for admission and one-third for relief assistance. We have now reversed these percentages reflecting the determination of the Administration to seek solutions to refugee crises other than admission to the U.S. We have sought to address refugee needs through assistance in the countries of first asylum and through pursuit of repatriation, resettlement in countries of asylum, or resettlement in third countries other than the U.S. We are pleased that we have succeeded in doing so while continuing to meet our humanitarian responsibilities through the admission to the U.S. of those who need this solution and are eligible under law.

The relief assistance category encompasses a number of programs, particularly relief programs identified by geographic area. In addition, we plan to maintain a small fund to foster resettlement opportunities other than resettlement in the United States, including voluntary repatriation and resettlement in place.

Prepared Statement by the Director of the Bureau for Refugee Programs, Department of State (Purcell), Before a Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, June 20, 1983 (Extract) [6]

The Definition of "Refugee"

When the Refugee Act of 1980 [7] was adopted nearly three years ago it was hailed as landmark legislation representing a new era in America's commitment to refugees. Although the United States had long been recognized as a leader in world efforts to assist and protect those fleeing their countries to escape persecution, our domestic legislation on the subject had not previously dealt with refugees in a comprehensive and principled manner. The Refugee Act of 1980 changed that, and it is a tribute to this Subcommittee and Committee that the Act has been so widely praised for its statesmanship and adherence to internationally recognized standards.

It will be recalled that in previous decades, although the U.S. had been generous in admitting refugees—Hungarians in 1956, Cubans and Czechoslovakians in the 1960's, Indochinese following the fall of Vietnam in 1975—these programs were carried out under what came to be recognized as a stretched application of humanitarian parole. What had been intended to aid individual refugees had come to serve as a means to admit large groups totalling in the many thousands.

What the process lacked in legal elegance, it made up in serviceability. Consultations took place with Congressional Committees, often at short notice, and decisions were reached providing a specified number of admissions for a particular group or class of refugees. For the groups covered by the paroles it can be said that the system worked, sometimes with such swiftness that it led to the arrival in our country of large numbers of refugees with only brief examinations overseas and with limited preparation by the private voluntary agencies that then and now play such vital roles in our refugee programs.

By the late 1970's, the group parole system became increasingly perceived as inadequate to the realities of the modern world. Refugees were appearing in larger numbers, more frequently, in more places. Although there continued to be major refugee exoduses from communist-dominated lands—from Indochina after 1975, from Afghanistan following the Soviet invasion, and in the Horn of Africa—there were also growing numbers of refugees in areas away from the periphery of the communist states. The previous system, which amounted to an ad hoc selection among potential refugee groups, was seen as no longer responsive to the requirements of the new situation. Spurred by the need to cope with the tide of boat people from Vietnam, the Congress and the Administration worked together towards the new definition and procedures embodied in the Refugee Act of 1980.

The centerpiece of the Act is its definition of a refugee.[8] There was little dispute that the definition to be adopted by the U.S. should be consistent with the international standard contained in the 1951 Refugee Convention and its 1967 Protocol (which eliminated the time limitation and the geographical restriction by which the Convention applied only to Europe). In the intervening years some 92 countries, including the United States, have become parties to the Convention or its Protocol, reflecting a general perception in virtually all regions of the world that the international definition properly identifies the class of persons in distress who merit the special protection and assistance that the international community has established for refugees.

Because the word "refugees" is often used loosely to describe people in various kinds of difficulty, it is sometimes made more precise by reference to "Convention" or "Protocol" refugees. For example, in recent months we have seen the word "refugees" applied to such persons as West Africans returning to their home countries after being expelled by Nigeria as illegal immigrants, to Africans seeking new sources of food in the face of drought, even to residents of our own western states forced to evacuate their homes during spring floods.

What the international definition provides is a recognition that refugees in the legal sense form a distinguishable category of persons in need. A body of law, practice and programs has grown up around this concept, with the result that helping refugees has taken on a status—even a stature—that defines it and separates it from programs to relieve other areas of human suffering. It has been said that the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees should not be considered "the High Commissioner for all good causes," a statement that recognizes that refugees are not the only persons in need, even as it emphasizes their special status.

So it is refugees, in this internationally established legal sense, to which we address ourselves in this hearing, and who are the subject of the definition in the Refugee Act. Although there may be disagreement about the manner in which the refugee definition is applied in individual cases or to certain groups, it is our conclusion that the definition has proved its usefulness in practice. It has served us well, and we see no gain in attempting to modify it.

Previous testimony has dealt with suggestions that the definition be narrowed, but it should be recognized that the more common assertion that we face in the management of our programs is that the definition should be broadened to cover

---

[8] "The term 'refugee' means (A) any person who is outside any country of such person's nationality or, in the case of a person having no nationality, is outside any country in which such person last habitually resided, and who is unable or unwilling to return to, and is unable or unwilling to avail himself or herself of the protection of that country because of persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion, or (B) in such special circumstances as the President after appropriate consultation (as defined in section 207(e) of this Act) may specify, any person who is within the country of such person's nationality or, in the case of a person having no nationality, within the country in which such person is habitually residing, and who is persecuted or who has a well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion. The term 'refugee' does not include any person who ordered, incited, assisted, or otherwise participated in the persecution of any person on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion." (Ibid.) individuals or groups who are not now qualified for refugee status.

One such broadening of the definition would have it apply to persons forced to leave their home countries because of foreign occupation or civil strife—a formulation contained in the African Refugee Convention adopted in 1969 by the Organization of African Unity (OAU). Although this definition has been accepted and applied in a number of refugee situations in Africa, this says more about the traditions of hospitality of the African states than about the desirability of extending this formulation to other areas of the world. In Southeast Asia, for example, we have observed the opposite tendency: a consistent refusal by states of the area to offer safe haven to refugees except on a temporary basis, and then only with guarantees that refugees will be moved elsewhere for permanent resettlement.

By contrast, at the African refugee conference in 1979, President Julius Nyerere of the host country, Tanzania, in his keynote statement said of Africa: "We welcome the refugees, we give them our space." Such a generous approach reflects the communality of Africa which has made possible the resettlement within the region of many thousands of refugees. However, we do not believe such a broad definition should be considered for United States admissions purposes.

Another broadening of the definition would have it cover "economic refugees" on the ground that persons deprived of a decent livelihood by oppressive economic conditions should have as much right to international protection and assistance as refugees from political or religious persecution. The problem with such an expansion of the definition is that it would encompass a major part of the world's population—those who live in the majority of countries classified as impoverished or underdeveloped. Western nations have recognized a responsibility to assist in the modernization and economic development of the third world by means of various forms of trade and assistance, private and public. But a readiness to assist in improving the living conditions of the poor majority does not carry with it an obligation to treat them all as refugees. Among those concerned with international refugee problems there has been little inclination to broaden the definition in this direction.

It should be emphasized that the definition of a refugee—in international law and in the Refugee Act—provides the framework for international protection and assistance, but does not of itself define the terms a government may set for the admission of refugees into its territory for permanent resettlement. This Committee is of course familiar with the procedures followed by the United States in determining how many and which refugees we will admit each year. The regular Consultations and the annual ceilings are at the heart of the process which was mandated in law by the Refugee Act of 1980.

Although the United States employs the definition as part of the process through which refugees are considered for admission, the definition does not tell us how many refugees shall be admitted or from which groups or regions the refugees shall be drawn. Those determinations remain, for us as for the other nations accepting refugees for international resettlement, a subject governed by national interest and foreign policy as well as humanitarian considerations.

Resettlement countries have their own procedures for deciding which refugees to admit, and in what number. Some countries give priority to those with whom they have family or other ties. For example, many of the Indochinese accepted by France had prior associations with that country. Other governments including the U.S. also look for such ties and tend to honor them in the context of a refugee program.

Some countries with smaller programs, such as Switzerland and the Scandinavian countries, have special programs to admit handicapped refugees, thus helping relieve what are often especially compelling humanitarian problems.

Where some other countries differ from the United States in their selection of refugees is in the application of standards of professional qualifications, language skills, education, etc.—sometimes summed up with the phrase "selection for quality"—with the selection carried out by immigration officials with relatively broad discretion to evaluate such "quality" attributes.

The United States has looked for more objective criteria to determine which refugees to accept for admission. During the period of group paroles this tended to amount to accepting all refugee applicants within a given group or category until the numbers were exhausted. In our implementation of the Refugee Act we have established a pre-screening process aimed at selecting refugees for the purpose of admission on the basis of "priorities" which take account of the immediacy of a refugee's plight and the relatives or other ties a refugee may have to the United States. The priorities represent a considered effort on the part of the U.S. Government to state in an objective manner the principles to be followed in deciding which refugees to admit.

There is a threshold question before the assignment of priorities is reached, and that is to determine that the persons to be considered are in fact refugees. On this issue the definition in the Refugee Act has provided the scope to cover a wide range of refugee situations of interest to the United States and the precision needed to make possible equitable decisions in individual cases. We believe it should be maintained in its current form.

In addition to applying the priorities and the refugee definition, it is our policy that refugees who have a firm offer of resettlement elsewhere will not be considered for admission to the United States. There are exceptions, such as individual cases who may have family ties both in the United States and elsewhere, with the stronger connection, however, to the United States, and Soviet Jews for whom a visa to Israel is the necessary condition of departure from the USSR, even though the individuals have relatives or other ties supporting their intention to come to the United States. The general policy, however, is not to consider refugees for the United States if they have a firm offer of resettlement elsewhere.

In our application of the definition and the priorities we have sought to achieve fairness as well as humanity. The United States cannot accept all deserving refugees. We can, however, strive to make our program as equitable as possible, without losing sight of other considerations of national interest and foreign policy. In most cases this means that we are able to apply our priorities with consistency within each geographic region and on a worldwide basis. Where such an equal application leads to unequal results, however, and in particular when it leads to results at variance with the projections provided in the Consultations with the Congress, we must adjust the application of the priorities accordingly. We have kept the Congress informed of such adjustments.

The effectiveness of a program can be seen in terms of its results, and we believe the admissions criteria that have been employed under the Refugee Act have produced a balanced program that has been responsive to our foreign policy and humanitarian concerns and to the requirements of our domestic situation.

During the past year we have taken a series of actions, in cooperation with the U.S. Coordinator and the Departments of Justice and Health and Human Services, aimed at improving procedures for the successful integration of refugees in our communities and cities. Our goal has been a program that insures that all refugees admitted to the United States should have a positive start on the road to self-sufficiency through employment as productive members of our society.

The programs we have instituted come during a period in which the number of refugees arriving in the United States has been substantially reduced from previous years. Responding to the clearly stated views of this Committee and its counterpart in the House of Representatives, we have operated well within the ceilings set during last fall's Consultations. Against an overall ceiling of 90,000 we expect the total number of arrivals this year to be in the 60–65,000 range.

Our region-by-region projections for FY 1983 are as follows:

Africa: 3,000 admissions (3,000 ceiling)

East Asia: 38,000–40,000 admissions (64,000 ceiling)

Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union: 15,000 admissions (15,000 ceiling)

Latin America and the Caribbean: 600–800 admissions (2,000 ceiling)

Near East and South Asia: 5,500 admissions (6,000 ceiling)

This has been a year in which we have been able to "manage down" our admissions program, in that we have taken advantage of the reduced numbers to achieve improvements in the way refugees are processed overseas and in their reception and placement in the United States, in the following areas:

—Steps to regularize the flow of refugees from overseas and to provide more information on arriving refugees;

—Improvements in the medical diagnosis and treatment of refugees;

—Expansion of English-as-a-Second-Language/Cultural Orientation (ESL/CO) overseas programs;

—Improvements in the reception and placement program and in our monitoring of the voluntary agencies;

—Actions to implement the Refugee Assistance Amendments of 1982.

Statement by the Representative at the U.N. General Assembly (Solarz) in the Third Committee, November 16, 1983 (Extract) [9]

International Burden-Sharing To Aid Refugees

. . . . . .

As we look to the future there is growing recognition of the need for a full international process of burden-sharing to aid refugees. Such a process needs to look for new ways to expand the circle of countries prepared to assist in caring for refugees. We also need to consider what can be done to anticipate and prevent refugee flows, in particular to reduce the size and duration of the massive exoduses that are occurring with increasing frequency. The rights of refugees need to be preserved and protected. At the same time the responsibility of states needs to be spelled out more clearly to reduce or eliminate the situations in which entire populations are forced to look to other countries for the minimum conditions of decent life.

This is especially evident as we recognize the growing difficulties that all refugee receiving countries, including my own, face in absorbing refugees. Even where refugee movements take place within a geographic region, they can have severe impact on the local populations and on economic development. The impact can be just as great if refugees are moved to distant third countries. The successful adaptation of some refugees should not obscure the hardship that the refugee experience imposes on all concerned.

If prevention is the best cure for a refugee problem, then the next best, clearly, is for refugees to be enabled to return freely to their homelands. Often this cannot take place right away but, in time, the factors that caused refugees to flee may change enough to make possible such voluntary repatriation. We have supported such efforts wherever proposed by the UNHCR, always insisting that there be safeguards to assure that the refugees' rights are protected.

Even if voluntary repatriation is not immediately in sight, it makes sense to care for refugees within their region. In many cases neighboring countries have ties of language or ethnic character which ease the acceptance of refugees and facilitate their longer-term integration. Such local resettlement also preserves the possibility of the refugees returning eventually to their homelands as conditions change.

Wherever possible we should try to develop programs aimed at easing the transition to refugee self-sufficiency and long-term solutions. We look to the UNHCR to take the lead in organizing the international aid effort in such a way as to engage the widest possible number of donors and to bring to bear the resources of the appropriate international agencies—the World Food Program, U.N. Children's Fund (UNICEF), the World Health Organization, and the U.N. Development Program. Non-U.N. bodies such as the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and the League of Red Cross Societies, as well as private humanitarian organizations also play vital roles in refugee assistance programs. Through these organizations, as well as directly, the United States aids refugees in every part of the world. U.S. refugee assistance will amount to some $300 million in 1983, including Food for Peace commodities, and is likely to reach that total in 1984 as well.

The High Commissioner's responsibilities for refugees can be encompassed by two words: protection and assistance. But to fulfill those responsibilities requires that the High Commissioner be prepared to act in a wide range of circumstances.

In the field of protection, the High Commissioner's role has had to expand from the traditional emphasis on legal protection to an active effort to deal with physical attacks on the very lives and persons of refugees.

We have supported the useful work undertaken to improve the protection of refugee settlements from military attacks. Because the subject bears a close relationship to existing principles of international law, it has been necessary to examine the proposals for their consistency with other aspects of legal doctrine. The objective and goal of the effort—to protect refugee camps against armed attack—has the wholehearted support of our government.

Recent attacks on Khmer refugees caused dozens of deaths and serious injuries and caused thousands of refugees to flee for their very lives. Fortunately, the Government of Thailand allowed the refugees to temporarily flee into Thailand, thus saving thousands of lives and reenforcing the great respect which the international community has for the Royal Thai Government.

But, there is probably no sadder chapter in the history of refugee movements than the fate which has befallen thousands of boat people. Taking to the sea in small and fragile crafts, they have faced the perils of ocean storms and the even worse threat of brutal and vicious attacks by pirates. Refugees have been raped, robbed, beaten, marooned, and murdered. Fifty-five percent of those boat refugees reaching Thailand this year have been attacked—two and three times each.

The High Commissioner has played an important role in seeking a wide range of international support for the joint Thai-UNHCR antipiracy program. We welcome the extension of that program and look for the development of an even more effective protection program with broader international participation that would reduce the risk of attack for all boat refugees no matter their destination in the region. Speaking personally, I have been active in the U.S. Congress, in my capacity as Chairman of the Asian Subcommittee of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, in winning $5 million to expand U.S. support for this program. It is an initiative that illustrates a needed shift towards physical protection of refugees, supplementing the traditional UNHCR emphasis on legal protection. The High Commissioner's Director responsible for protection, Mr. P.M. Moussalli, deserves recognition for his continuing leadership in helping to consolidate efforts for these programs.

In the assistance area, the UNHCR continues to be responsible for a vast quantity of resources, which the High Commissioner has described as a tenfold increase over a decade ago. The scope of programs has been documented this year, as in the past, in the annual report on UNHCR assistance. We commend the High Commissioner for the thoroughness of this report. As one who shares responsibility in the U.S. Government for the authorization and appropriation of funds for refugee assistance, I can assure you, Mr. High Commissioner, of the importance we attach to having available such a dependable and comprehensive record of your assistance programs. I would urge that you even develop improved demographic analyses of refugee populations so that donor countries could more readily understand and project the types of assistance needed, particularly for women refugees, and respond more fully to both emergency care situations as well as self-sufficiency projects.

The international economic downturn of the last few years coupled with the size of refugee populations makes it all the more essential that the High Commissioner's programs not only be managed effectively but that they be seen to be so managed. The volume of resources now required for the benefit of refugees and the competition for contributions to humanitarian programs of various kinds require UNHCR to take on an increasingly active role in the operational management of the programs that are established under its leadership. Without good management resources are wasted, and donor confidence and support must necessarily wane.

Address by the Director of the Bureau for Refugee Programs, Department of State (Purcell), Before the Intergovernmental Council for Migration, Geneva, December 7, 1983 [10]

The Role of the Intergovernmental Committee for Migration

It is indeed a pleasure, as well as an honor, to address this session of the council—a session in which we have recognized the qualities of the man who has directed this organization for the past 5 years. That recognition has been demonstrated resoundingly and unanimously by the appointment of James L. Carlin to serve a second term as Director.

We have listened with great interest to the opening remarks delivered by the Director. We thank him for his succinct review of ICM's activities over the past year, as well as for his thought-provoking remarks on ICM's role in the field of humanitarian endeavor. Permit me to highlight, from my delegation's perspective, a number of points the Director has raised.

My first remark concerns ICM's contribution on behalf of refugees in all regions of the world. ICM's worldwide role was noted formally in 1980, when the working name of the organization was modified. If there was recognition then that ICM's activities had broadened considerably over the years, we now see even more clearly how appropriate that change was. ICM is represented in one form or another on all continents. Increasingly, it has become involved in activities in Southeast Asia, Africa, and the Americas, without detriment to its ongoing commitment to its European members. A mere glance at the documents submitted to this council provides strong testimony to this fact. The statistics provided to us are impressive. They demonstrate the enormity of the task facing an international community concerned with assistance to, and resettlement for, refugees. Perhaps even more important, however, is the quality of the service provided and the efficiency with which programs are carried out.

Over the years, my country has entrusted ICM with much of the responsibility for processing refugees for resettlement in the United States. This includes preparation of documents, medical examinations and inoculations, and transportation arrangements. The United States, with a worldwide refugee resettlement program, has asked ICM to take on these tasks in all regions. ICM has done so in places as widespread as Rome, Port Sudan, Phanat Nikhom, and San Jose—and the list goes on. In each case, ICM has adapted; ICM has surmounted obstacles; ICM has done the job and has always done it well.

Of particular importance to the United States, of course, have been ICM's activities in Southeast Asia, the location of the United States' largest resettlement effort. Meanwhile, we must not lose sight of other programs which also present challenges, which often must be mounted quickly, yet which are just as well organized and just as efficient as larger projects of long duration. In this context, I think particularly of the facility at Bad Soden in the Federal Republic of Germany—one of the most cost-effective and trouble-free resettlement operations which we have seen. Whether large or small, such ICM activities on behalf of refugees merit the sincere praise and thanks of us all. Without exaggeration, I can say that ICM enjoys our government's highest esteem. I believe that the presence on the U.S. delegation of representatives of the Congress and of two departments within the executive branch provides clear evidence of that fact.

Refugee activities are important. But they are not all that ICM does. In the past year, my government has noted with great interest ICM's ongoing efforts to develop national migration projects at the request of its members. We all know that over the years ICM has gained considerable experience in this field. It has put that experience to work, for example, in developing the special program for the transfer of qualified human resources to Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Honduras, and Panama. The effort that has gone into the preparation of a detailed survey for this program is commendable, demonstrating the commitment both of ICM and of the participating governments to its successful implementation. We, along with many others in this room, have recognized the need for highly skilled persons to assist in the development of priority sectors of those countries' economies. It is for this reason that my government has contributed to a program which we trust will make a positive impact.

Also regarding the Americas, the United States has funded an extensive research project on migration within the region, to be carried out by ICM with the collaboration of Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., and researchers from institutions in Latin America. It is our hope that the results of this project will increase our knowledge and deepen our understanding of both the causes and consequences of migration in the Western Hemisphere. We are convinced that such a project will be of service not only to us but to our friends and neighbors throughout the hemisphere as we work together to address this shared concern.

We would like to associate ourselves with the satisfaction expressed by the member countries of the region during the Cartagena Seminar for the creation of the Centro de Informacion sobre Migraciones en America Latina (CIMAL) and the publication of the Journal. In fact, we share their views that both CIMAL and the Journal are very important instruments called upon to meet specific needs regarding information as well as counseling on migration matters. The establishment of CIMAL had an important bearing in the decision of the U.S. Government to provide ICM with the financing required for the implementation of the Hemispheric Migration Project. We, therefore, congratulate ICM for these important achievements and express our wishes for the continuous success of CIMAL.

In the field of return of talent, the United States has watched with particular interest the development of the ICM program for Africa—a special project initially undertaken at the request of, and funded by, the European Economic Community. After careful consideration, and with confidence in ICM's abilities in this field, the United States recently made a voluntary contribution for expansion of the program. The U.S. contribution will allow for placement of potential candidates who desire to put their skills to use in Africa but who, without assistance, are unable to locate employment or to afford the cost of the move.

As I noted in my opening comments, these are only highlights of particular programs. We all know that ICM does much more, and that many other programs could be mentioned. However, I also have been reflecting on Mr. Carlin's address, and I would like to add some brief remarks on a more theoretical and, perhaps, more philosophical plane.

I would submit that ICM's humanitarian role is unique. While involved on the one hand in the very practical, down-to-earth arrangements for the movement of refugees to a resettlement country, ICM also has a migration mandate. We, the members of this council, must continually bear in mind that dual role. As times change, needs evolve; the balance between ICM's two activities, therefore, may shift to the benefit of one or the other. The governing bodies of this organization have a long history of working together and discussing issues such as these. It is right that we continue to do so, with each making every effort to understand the needs and concerns of all the others.

I also believe it appropriate to note that in these difficult economic times, hard choices must be made concerning the allocation of funds. What is true for a business is also true for an international organization: the clearly superior project which addresses a clearly identified need is much more likely to receive attention. We would encourage all members to reflect on their role in the fields of refugee resettlement and migration, to recognize the real strengths of ICM, and to provide this organization with the support it needs to carry out its mandate.

It has been this organization's strength that it works as a team and that its member governments feel very much a part of that team. I am encouraged, based on the remarks made by so many speakers yesterday in support of Mr. Carlin's reelection, that his efforts on behalf of each and every member of this organization, and his responsiveness to our needs, are recognized. On behalf of my government, I can assure you that the United States is pledged to continued close collaboration with ICM and to support its activities in furtherance of our common goals.

With your permission, I would like to make a very personal observation. Over the 5 years that I have worked on refugee matters, I have seen many situations in which helpless people, including many children, faced grave danger and the daily possibility of loss of life if forced to stay where they were. The most dangerous and potentially hopeless case of this nature which I have seen was that of the Vietnamese refugees at the NW 82 camp on the border between Thailand and Kampuchea. There, nearly 2,000 persons, many of them women and young children, were crowded into a space not much larger than the room in which we are meeting today. In addition to physical and psychological pressures of extreme crowding, the NW 82 inmates experienced disease, exposure to the elements, and acts of violence at the hands of the much larger Kampuchean refugee group concentrated in the same area and, more importantly, from the Vietnamese army amassed only a short distance from the NW 82 site. When authorization was granted to move these refugees out of the region, that authorization was contingent upon the quickest and most efficient processing and movement of the refugees. We knew of only one organization which could guarantee the required prompt and expert action. That organization was ICM. Within hours after our initial contact with Director Carlin in Geneva, ICM staff were on their way to set up a field camp processing office at NW 82. ICM's personnel worked day and night, at times under gunfire from Vietnamese troops. In less than a week, all of the NW 82 refugees had been registered and dossiers on individual cases were on the desks of resettlement governments' embassies. I repeat that no other organization could have done this job as well and as quickly as ICM. Due to ICM's work, the NW 82 refugees had already departed the border when the Vietnamese army overran the site where they had been.

ICM's performance in this situation is only one dramatic example of the invaluable work which ICM undertakes every day of the year throughout the world.

I have stated sincere admiration for the work of ICM. I would be remiss if I did not add, by extension, my government's belief that this organization's strengths, its sound administration, and its prudent financial management argue strongly for more governments to reflect upon what ICM can do and to consider seriously full membership. Over the past years, in our bilateral contacts with several governments which have strong interest in the successful continuation of ICM's programs, we have urged those governments which are not now full members to join ICM. Again, here today I would like to reiterate our conviction that the world community needs the strongest possible Intergovernmental Committee for Migration. This can be achieved if all responsible governments concerned about refugee and migration affairs join this organization and provide ICM with their fullest possible support.

Prepared Statement by the Director of the Office for Combatting Terrorism (Sayre) Before a Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, April 12, 1983 [1]

Proposal for Antiterrorism Training and Assistance for Friendly Foreign Governments

I appreciate this opportunity to testify in behalf of one important element of the President's program to combat and deter international terrorism. Specifically, we are requesting authorization to begin a program of antiterrorism training and assistance for friendly foreign governments. To undertake this program, we have requested 5 new positions for the Department of State and an appropriation of $5 million for fiscal year 1984.

We first presented this program for Congressional consideration last year. Hearings were held by the appropriate committees and a number of thoughtful and useful suggestions and amendments were proposed. The legislation we are proposing this year is a combination of our original proposal plus virtually all of the congressional amendments. These changes provide for more specific congressional oversight and a tighter adhesion to the program's antiterrorism theme.

Under this proposal, we would offer, grant, and sell training assistance to civil and police authorities of foreign governments to enable them to respond more effectively to terrorists' acts. Training and equipment would be offered in areas such as antiterrorist precautions, incident management, hostage and barricade negotiations, airport antihijacking security measures, bomb disposal, and dignitary and facility protection.

The program will:

—Provide training courses in antiterrorism skills for friendly, developing countries subject to a terrorist threat;

—Provide limited amounts of appropriate antiterrorist equipment to complement specific training programs;

—Arrange training on a reimbursable basis and information exchange at U.S. facilities for officials of friendly, developed countries to enhance the sharing of antiterrorism expertise as part of the President's overall program to combat international terrorism.

The objectives of this program are to:

—Enhance the law enforcement antiterrorism skills of friendly countries;

—Strengthen our bilateral ties with friendly governments by offering concrete assistance in this area of great mutual concern;

—Enhance cooperation in antiterrorism with the developed countries between their officials involved in combating terrorism and those in the USG;

—Increase respect for human rights by foreign civil authorities by exposing them to modern and humane methods of effective preventive antiterrorism techniques;

—Enhance the ability of foreign governments to protect U.S. overseas missions from terrorist attacks;

—Contribute to the safety of Americans traveling overseas by lessening the likelihood that they will be caught up in an act of international terrorism such as aircraft hijacking.

Before I describe our proposal in more detail, let me outline the key considerations which have led the President to propose this important new initiative. There is a growing terrorist threat in the world today, which is graphically demonstrated by the following statistics:

—The number of international terrorist acts—violent crimes such as assassination, skyjacking, hostage taking, and bombings—has increased from 142 in 1968 to 746 in 1982.

—Attacks against diplomats have increased from 80 in 1968 to 409 in 1981.

—The United States has continued to be the principal target of international terrorist attacks; about 1/3 have been against American targets. Five American Ambassadors have been murdered in terrorist attacks, more than the number of U.S. Generals killed in action in Viet Nam. The murder of Colonel Ray in Paris and the kidnapping of General Dozier are only two of the most publicized attacks against Americans.

—Nor has American business abroad been spared. Between 1968 and 1980 there were 901 attacks against American business executives or facilities.

—Other innocents have suffered both as targets, such as the infamous slaughter at Lod Airport in Israel, or as bystanders, as in the bombing of the Bologna train station in 1980.

—Terrorist incidents were recorded in 93 countries in 1982.

The statistics I have quoted relate to international terrorist acts—that is, they do not include terrorist attacks which have occurred inside various countries against domestic victims. We have also continued to experience terrorist crimes in the United States committed by American terrorists, as well as attacks here by terrorists from other countries, usually directed against non-American targets such as Turkish or Yugoslav diplomats resident here.

Today I would like to emphasize two aspects of the terrorist threat: its political significance and its international character.

The numbers of individuals who have been personally touched by terrorist acts—those who have been killed, wounded, or kidnapped, and their relatives and friends—represent a human tragedy. At the same time they represent a political challenge. In a sense most of these individuals were symbols, not targets. The purpose of their suffering, from the point of view of the terrorist perpetrators, was often to influence someone else. The long-term challenge of terrorism is the effect it has on responsible governments and government officials. As V.I. Lenin once said, "The aim of terrorism is to terrify." The terrorist objective is to obtain or exercise political power by threatening and frightening, ultimately to intimidate, those who cannot be influenced by more pacific political ways.

The terrorist rejects the validity of the peaceful political process. He elevates violence to doctrine. He deliberately confuses means and ends and thereby threatens the framework of modern political society.

As serious a threat as this is to well-established democratic governments such as ours, it is potentially fatal to developing countries and governments, many of whom are still in the process of creating permanent institutions and stable democratic structures. The terrorist understands the fragility of such governments, and is well aware of the potential destructiveness of his actions. Terrorists set out to destroy existing structures and to frustrate efforts to build new ones.

The problem of terrorism has several international aspects. First, there are undeniable links between many terrorist groups. We know that among various terrorist groups there are exchanges of information, expertise, training, money, weapons, ideology, and general support.

Second, there are undeniable links between various terrorist organizations and governments. Libya, Syria, the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen, and Cuba have been identified as repeated supporters of acts of international terrorism.

Third, terrorists, like criminals, cross borders, which makes it virtually impossible for a single government to deal effectively with the terrorist threat.

Finally, terrorists have increasingly begun to attack target governments outside of their territories; for example by attacking diplomats resident in a third country. This particular tactic is of special international concern because it poses a threat to the entire international diplomatic establishment.

These connections, relationships, international movements, and tactics significantly complicate the efforts of individual governments to deal with terrorist acts within their borders, and the efforts of governments to act collectively as members of the world community.

President Reagan is deeply concerned about the terrorist threat and is determined to do something about it. U.S. policy in this area is multifold. We are taking unilateral policy steps against nations which support or abet terrorism. Libya is a current example. We are also increasing the security of U.S. diplomatic missions.

However, international cooperation is also essential to an effective effort to combat terrorism. No one nation can do it alone simply because of the very nature of contemporary terrorism. Cooperation can take many forms, including the exchange of information, tighter controls on the movement of weapons and explosives, more effective extradition procedures, and discouraging support for terrorist groups. States with diverse forms of government, in all parts of the world, should share a common interest in eliminating terrorism by taking concrete steps to attain common goals.

However, we also believe that more active cooperation is required. Our proposal to provide antiterrorism training and assistance is this sort of active cooperation. When terrorist incidents occur overseas, we look to the local government to discharge its responsibilities under international law to protect all persons within its boundaries. This includes protection from acts of terrorism. It is with these thoughts in mind that we have developed the program we are presenting today. It is designed to further international effectiveness in combating terrorism by assisting countries in fulfilling their share of that international obligation and in pursuing our common objectives.

Many countries are relatively ill-equipped to deal with this problem. Key civil officials, primarily those officials responsible for the maintenance of law and order, could benefit from our experience in dealing with this problem.

To meet this need, we have proposed this antiterrorism program. A key element of it is the training which would be provided to key civil officials of interested governments. They would include senior police, civil aviation, immigration, and other officials responsible for urban and national civil administration. We plan to concentrate, at least at the beginning of the program, on training of officials who are responsible for crisis management in participating governments.

Based on the participating government's evaluation of its own specific needs we would provide more specific training for middle manager level officials. For instance, we could offer to train the actual hostage negotiator, the officer directly responsible for airport security, or the official who would be the on-site police commander for an incident such as the seizure of an Embassy.

We intend to provide this training at existing Federal institutions in the United States, using the expertise of several domestic agencies. Primary facilities to be used are the FBI Academy at Quantico, Virginia, the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center at Glynco, Georgia, and the Transportation Safety Institute at Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. All of the training programs we plan to make available to foreign participants already exist and are being given to Federal, State, and local officials and, in some cases, to foreign officials (notably the aviation security courses). Under this program we would not provide training programs overseas, nor would we assign advisers permanently overseas.

In addition to providing training, we hope to provide some equipment to complement specific training. For instance, passenger screening equipment for airports might be offered in connection with an airport security course, and explosive ordnance disposal equipment might be provided in connection with a bomb disposal program. However, we envisage only a modest program of equipment transfer.

While training and equipment would be provided on a grant basis primarily to countries which need to improve their capabilities, we will sell these services and materials to our friends and allies among the developed nations. We hope to coordinate our efforts with them to assist Third World countries and to expand the sharing of information on terrorism.

The training and advisory services provided by other U.S. Government agencies would be on a reimbursable basis for the additional costs that agencies incur, in the same fashion as we now reimburse DOD for training provided for the IMST program.

A key question in the administration of this program obviously concerns the selection of participating countries. We would take into account the following factors before providing antiterrorism assistance to a country:

1. Does it face a terrorist threat, actual or potential?

2. Is it committed to participate in combating terrorism?

3. Does it wish to cooperate bilaterally with the United States against terrorism? and,

4. Is its human rights record compatible with U.S. legislative criteria for the receipt of U.S. Government assistance?

Although we have done a certain amount of planning and preparation for the implementation of this program, we have—in the absence of congressional authorization—abstained from drawing up a list of potential participating countries. Once Congress favorably acts upon our request, we would use the criteria I have listed to prepare such a list.

We intend to consult with the Congress on proposed participants prior to implementation of the program. In succeeding years, we would expect to provide Congress with an annual report of participating countries, plus a list of proposed participant countries for the following year. I would like to emphasize that this program will be completely open and unclassified.

This program will be administered by the Department of State, in a manner similar to training activities conducted in connection with the International Narcotics Control Program. We intend to obtain additional staff for the State Department's Office for Combating Terrorism, which will manage the Department's responsibilities. As I stated earlier, actual training will be provided, on a reimbursable basis, by other USG agencies which are expert in the required fields of instruction. Contact with potential participating countries will be through normal diplomatic channels.

We are requesting authorization and appropriation of $5 million and 5 positions in FY 1984, $4.6 million for the training and some equipment transfers and $400,000 for related management and administrative costs. We believe this is adequate for the first full year of operations. We are also asking for authorization to transfer from FY 1983 appropriations up to $2.5 million of funds available for other provisions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, and the Arms Export Control Act to enable us to begin this program in the current fiscal year.

Although the bill would authorize this program, notwithstanding the provisions of Section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act relating to prohibitions on police training, we have formulated this program with due consideration to the concerns which led to the enactment of Section 660. This present proposal has been purposefully designed to deal with the specific problem of combating international terrorism. We will not be training policemen as policemen. We will be attempting to assist threatened governments to make a more significant contribution to a worldwide effort in cooperation with us and other like-minded governments.

This administration is convinced that present day political terrorism poses a serious threat to us, to our friends, and to organized international society. We believe that an international effort is necessary to deal with that specific danger.

Thank you.

Foreign Government-Sponsored Terrorism

. . . . . .

Q. Subject three: with the prospect of continuing widespread terrorist attacks, how can the United States retaliate, especially when such attacks are inspired or sponsored by governments?

THE PRESIDENT. One of the hardest things, of course, is to prove that the terrorist attacks are sponsored by a government. For example, these groups that are taking credit for the recent suicide attacks are believed to have an Iranian connection. There is a faction of Iranians that believe in a holy war. We do have the evidence that Khomeini has spoken a number of times about advocating a holy war in the Moslem world to promote his type of fundamentalism. So it's hard not to believe that he must, in some way, instigate or at least egg on those that are doing these things.

But the important thing about terrorism is not to be turned back by it. It is a worldwide threat, as we know. The threat is right here in our own country. It's every place in the world.

Q. What can be done to counter the terrorist threat?

THE PRESIDENT. I believe that if terrorists are claiming triumphs when they do these terrible deeds, acknowledging what their goal is and that they have a connection with some country—then I think it's up to the government of that country to try to curb and control such groups. If some of our own terrorist groups commit these outrages—such as the group that just bombed a naval recruiting station in New York—it's our responsibility to corral them, find out who and what they are, and bring them to justice. But the same is true for all the other countries.

But the one thing we can't do is what so many people, even here in our own country, are advocating in the face of the terrorist attacks against our forces in Lebanon. That is to bring home the Marines from Lebanon. If terrorism can succeed in its goal, then the world is going to find itself under the control of the terrorists. You have to stand against that and not let it succeed.

Q. What do you do if a government is actually responsible, as you say, for instigating terrorism? Can you really ask that kind of a government to assume responsibility for controlling these terrorists?

THE PRESIDENT. In those cases, I think that the civilized world has to get together and see what action can be taken. This does not necessarily mean warlike action, but pressures that can be put on a government—pressures such as saying to that government, "You start taking some steps to control this, or you'll be outlawed in the rest of the world."

U.S. Military Response to Terrorism

. . . . . .

B. Discussion.

The Commission believes that terrorism as a military threat to U.S. military forces is becoming increasingly serious. As a super power with worldwide interests, the United States is the most attractive terrorist target and, indeed, statistics confirm this observation. Terrorism is warfare "on the cheap" and entails few risks. It permits small countries to attack U.S. interests in a manner, which if done openly, would constitute acts of war and justify a direct U.S. military response.

Combating terrorism requires an active policy. A reactive policy only forfeits the initiative to the terrorists. The Commission recognizes that there is no single solution. The terrorist problem must be countered politically and militarily at all levels of government. Political initiatives should be directed at collecting and sharing intelligence on terrorist groups, and promptly challenging the behavior of those states which employ terrorism to their own ends. It makes little sense to learn that a State or its surrogate is conducting a terrorist campaign or planning a terrorist attack and not confront that government with political or military consequences if it continues forward.

U.S. military forces lack an effective capability to respond to terrorist attacks, particularly at the lower ends of the conflict spectrum. The National Command Authorities should have a wide range of options for reaction. Air strikes or naval gunfire are not always enough. The whole area of military response needs to be addressed to identify a wider range of more flexible options and planning procedures.

State sponsored terrorism poses a serious threat to U.S. policy and the security of U.S. personnel and facilities overseas and thus merits the attention of military planners. The Department of Defense needs to recognize the importance of state sponsored terrorism and must take appropriate measures to deal with it.

C. Conclusion.

The Commission concludes that state sponsored terrorism is an important part of the spectrum of warfare and that adequate response to this increasing threat requires an active national policy which seeks to deter attack or reduce its effectiveness. The Commission further concludes that this policy needs to be supported by political and diplomatic actions and by a wide range of timely military response capabilities.

D. Recommendation.

The Commission recommends that the Secretary of Defense direct the Joint Chiefs of Staff to develop a broad range of appropriate military responses to terrorism for review, along with political and

U.S. Goals and Objectives for International Narcotics Control

. . . . . .

The Administration's goals and objectives in international narcotics control were declared in the Federal strategy that President Reagan endorsed October 5. [2]

The Bureau's primary mission is to control the flow of illicit drugs from their sources to the United States. An estimated 90 percent of the illicit narcotics consumed in the United States are of foreign origin. The worldwide supply of marijuana, cocaine, heroin and other drugs is so great and trafficking channels to the United States so diverse that major interdictions and even crop eradications, when achieved in only one or two producing areas, have caused only temporary declines in availability.

The Department's program strategy is therefore predicated on the ultimate objective of controlling production simultaneously in all key geographic sectors of illicit drugs exported to the United States, so that significant and lasting reductions in availability are achieved. We believe that preventing cultivation and destroying illicit narcotics at their source will ultimately prove to be the most effective means of reducing availability. In keeping with that ultimate objective, INM's first priority, in negotiating bilateral agreements and in discussions on multilateral projects with international organizations which we fund, is on crop control—government bans on cultivation and production, enforced by manual or chemical crop eradication. Our second priority is on interdiction as close to the production source as possible and supported by other enforcement activities, and then on interdiction of drugs as they move from producing areas and through transit countries to the United States.

The major drug producing and trafficking countries are parties to conventions which obligate them to control the production and distribution of illicit drugs. Our international strategy is based on encouraging and, where necessary, assisting these countries in meeting their responsibilities for reducing the cultivation, production, and trafficking in illicit drugs within their borders.

. . . . . .

The Secretary of State is a member of the South Florida Task Force and, while our primary assignment in Task Force directives is to pursue crop control agreements with Colombia, Bolivia, Peru and Jamaica, the Department has undertaken a variety of programs in the Caribbean region. Our expenditures of approximately $5 million in the 5 years ending in fiscal year 1982 included funding for a project by Colombian Customs to interdict trafficking in the Caribbean, as well as a special project by the Colombian Navy for narcotics patrols in the Caribbean and Pacific. We have provided small patrol vessels to the Government of the Bahamas to increase the mobility of its narcotics forces; we have also provided telex equipment and language instruction to facilitate cooperation by Bahamian police. We assisted the Haitian Navy in rejuvenating its fleet for narcotics patrols in the Windward Passage, a key route between Colombia and Florida; the Haitian Navy, which provides information on suspect ships to our Coast Guard, seized a boat carrying 9 tons of marijuana in January. Our efforts in this region have also included cooperation with the Coast Guard on the establishment of a telex link between selected Caribbean and Central American countries and the Coast Guard for transmitting vessel tracking intelligence. We have provided a launch to the Turks and Caicos. In Central America, we have provided some telecommunications equipment to Costa Rica; communications and laboratory equipment to the Panamanian National Guard; radios and vehicles to the Honduran police; and, we will provide vehicles and other commodities to Belize to support future eradication programs.

We cooperate with governments on the development of local police and customs capabilities to enforce domestic narcotics laws by funding training of foreign enforcement personnel by DEA and Customs. In just the past 2 years, 225 persons from Caribbean countries, as well as 233 persons from Central America and Mexico, received INM-funded training—20 percent of all foreign nationals receiving such training in these 2 fiscal years. In the past 5 years, a total of 807 officials from this region have received INM-funded training, including 475 from the Caribbean and 332 from Central America—among them 53 officials from the Bahamas. Other units in State and Justice are actively exploring with various Caribbean countries mutual legal assistance and extradition treaties to strengthen bilateral cooperation on criminal law enforcement matters, including the sharing of financial information that is critically needed to deprive traffickers of their profits.

. . . . . .

The United States narcotics control strategy includes diplomatic initiatives to achieve greater participation by and program coordination with other governments. In recent months, INM, with explicit support from Secretary Shultz, has been conducting discussions with Governments in Canada, Europe and Japan, to seek greater international narcotic control efforts from them, both bilaterally and through international organizations. We particularly want to coordinate United States narcotics control initiatives and our program assistance to producing and transit countries with those of European governments. For example, through the United Nations or bilaterally, the Federal Republic of Germany is participating in control programs in Pakistan and Turkey, the Norwegian Government is active in crop control in Burma and Australia is active in Thailand. Italy and Sweden have indicated interest in supporting development programs to achieve coca control.

United States drug enforcement agencies and our diplomatic missions maintain productive working relations with their European counterparts—which are improving as Europeans recognize the long-term implications of drug abuse on their societies. European governments are assigning greater numbers of narcotics enforcement advisors to their diplomatic missions in producing countries. Diplomatic and program assistance coordination with the Europeans continues to be conducted through international organizations, particularly organs of the United Nations. We are encouraged by increased attention being given the narcotics issue by some foreign ministries and political leaders.

Since its founding in 1971 with United States sponsorship, the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control has been a vehicle for raising international consciousness about illicit drug issues and for implementation of crop control, enforcement and demand reduction programs. The Fund also brings the prestige of the United Nations to the issue of narcotics control. While UNFDAC projects complement U.S. programs in some countries, it has carried out projects in other areas when the United States could not because of political or other considerations. We have budgeted $2.5 million as our contribution to UNFDAC in fiscal year 1984. We are also budgeting $75,000 for support of the Colombo Plan.

In sum, we are pursuing the Administration strategy of increasing crop control and interdiction in the source countries. The Bureau's requested authorization for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 anticipates a continuation and expansion of crop control and interdiction efforts in major producing and transit countries. Our requested increase centers on the coca and marijuana threat from South America, while expanding our efforts to reduce the influx of heroin from Southwest and Southeast Asia.

Statement Issued by the White House, March 23, 1983 [3]

National Narcotics Border Interdiction System

The President today announced the formation of the National Narcotics Border Interdiction System (NNBIS) to interdict the flow of narcotics into the United States. NNBIS will be headed by Vice President George Bush. There will be an Executive Board which will include the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Defense and Transportation, the Attorney General, the Counselor to the President, the Director of Central Intelligence, and the Director of the White House Drug Abuse Policy Office.

Designed to coordinate the work of those federal agencies with existing responsibilities and capabilities for interdiction of seaborne, airborne, and cross-border importation of narcotics, NNBIS will complement but not replicate the duties of the regional Drug Enforcement Task Forces operated by the Department of Justice.

NNBIS will monitor suspected smuggling activity originating outside national borders and destined for the United States, and will coordinate agencies' seizure of contraband and arrests of persons involved in illegal drug importation.

The Coordinating Board for NNBIS will be headed by Admiral Daniel J. Murphy, Chief of Staff to the Vice President, who has chaired the Working Group of the South Florida Drug Task Force, also under Vice President Bush. The Coordinating Board membership will be composed of ranking officials from the Departments of State, Defense, Treasury, Justice, Transportation, Central Intelligence, and their subordinate agencies and offices.

Address by Vice President Bush Before the National Press Club, June 17, 1983 [4]

Combating Drug Trafficking Across U.S. Borders

Good afternoon ladies and gentlemen. It's a pleasure to be back before the National Press Club not only to speak to you on a subject of serious national concern but to also convey a message to those Americans who are listening to this program over National Public Radio and Cable News Network.

In 1983 millions of Americans will spend approximately $100 billion on illicit drugs. The overwhelming majority of that total will be spent on cocaine, marijuana, and heroin. This is a staggering total that is diverted from the nation's legitimate economy and put into the hands of drug dealers and traffickers. When users look at cocaine and heroin and marijuana, they see a drug that is white or green or even brown. Well, they're wrong. The color of those drugs is red—blood red. Because that's what the drug business is in the United States, the most deadly and dangerous criminal activity known.

Drug trafficking and all of its attendant activities not only threaten the social fabric of a large portion of our people and the stability of various regions in our nation, but also foster a multitude of other illegal activities including murder, public corruption and corrupt banking practices. Drug profits are so great that the personal risks to the men and women who enforce our nation's narcotics laws have grown dramatically and dangerously over the past 5 years. The profits of drug criminals are so staggering that the most sophisticated planes, boats and electronic intelligence equipment are employed to avoid apprehension.

The criminal cast involved in this deadly business has a substantial financial advantage over numerous law enforcement agencies, especially local law enforcement agencies. And this advantage is used for one reason—to avoid arrest and prosecution. To counteract this national curse, the Reagan administration is determined to use every available resource. We are determined to employ not only all of the law enforcement agencies, but the U. S. military and our nation's intelligence community. To date, we have made significant progress. But let's be realistic, there is much, much more to be done in the war against drugs.

Last year President Reagan announced a federal strategy for the prevention of drug use and drug trafficking. [5] He divided the problem into five areas: first, international cooperation; second, drug law enforcement; third, education and prevention; fourth, user treatment; and finally, research. While we are making considerable progress in each of these areas, today I would like to direct my remarks to the law enforcement aspect of our national strategy, and announce the kickoff of an important new effort.

In February of 1982, I announced in Miami, Florida the establishment of the South Florida Task Force. [6] The President asked me to lead this multiagency effort against the criminal element that had virtually taken over and terrorized the Miami metropolitan area. Miami, once a vacation paradise for millions of Americans, became the playground for cocaine cowboys and thousands of other criminals involved in drug trafficking. The situation was critical and demanded a major Federal law enforcement response. In a very brief period of time we sent to South Florida additional Federal judges, more prosecuting attorneys and hundreds of additional law enforcement personnel. We beefed up the U.S. Coast Guard, solicited and received help from the Defense Department including the Navy, the Army, the Air Force, and the Marines. We intensified our diplomatic initiatives which resulted in improved cooperation with the Bahamian Government and some of our Latin American friends. The results have been gratifying but we are by no means satisfied.

The record shows that in South Florida, we have made progress not only in terms of combating crime and thwarting the efforts of drug smugglers, but also in terms of improving the morale of the people of the area. We have brought them hope for the future especially as it relates to the quality of life in Miami and the surrounding areas.

In February 1981, a public opinion survey taken by Miami business leaders asked this question: "Are you seriously considering moving out of the area because of the crime and drug problems?" Thirty-nine percent of the respondees said they were. The same poll was taken in February of this year and only 9 percent said they were considering leaving. This is a tremendous improvement in people's attitude toward their community's future. Much of this change, this mood of optimism, can be attributed to the work of the dedicated men and women assigned to the Task Force.

While the war on narcotics continues in South Florida, there is impressive evidence that we are making solid progress. Drug arrests are up 27 percent. Marijuana seizures are up 23 percent. Cocaine seizures are up 54 percent. In the past 15 months we have seized nearly 3 million pounds of marijuana and more than 17 thousand pounds of cocaine in and around the South Florida area. The street value of those drugs is about $5 billion.

No one can, or will deny, that too many drugs are still coming into the United States. But we have demonstrated an ability to make life difficult for the drug smuggler and the drug dealer. In addition to seizure efforts, we have launched financial investigations that not only confiscate money, but take away assets—the planes and ships, cars, and safe houses—the basic infrastructure for drug organizations to operate effectively. Many of these investigations have been highly successful. We plan to do more. We will increase the heat and bring up the pressure.

I noted with interest this week that the Government [General] Accounting Office issued its final report on federal drug interdiction efforts.[7] I was pleased that the report gives our efforts in South Florida good marks. Many of the drug problems addressed in the GAO report are the very same problems that we have attempted to solve through our South Florida Task Force. They include the need for improved coordination and cooperation among all law enforcement agencies—Federal, State and local—the necessity for improved intelligence and the obvious need for more assets. The report accurately points out that our efforts in South Florida have caused disruption in the smuggling patterns and smuggling routes of traffickers, especially those operating out of the Caribbean, Central and Latin America. As a result we have witnessed an increase in drug smuggling up and down the Atlantic Coast, in the Gulf of Mexico, across the Mexican border, and into California. While we have watched the changing tactics and innovations of the drug smugglers, we have laid careful plans to counteract these bold new criminal measures.

On March 23 of this year, the President announced the establishment of the National Narcotics Border Interdiction System,[8] a bipartisan, permanent program to protect our borders. The NNBIS will be operating in every region of the nation. It will utilize the general principles and the most successful interdiction techniques of the south Florida Task Force in order to buttress our national drug deterrence effort.

Today I am announcing the establishment of five new regional centers in addition to the one already operating in Miami. Each office will have a regional coordinator and deputy coordinator from Customs or Coast Guard. In the northeast the regional center will be responsible for interdicting drugs from the American/Canadian border at Erie, Pennsylvania, up to and around Maine, and down to the Maryland/Delaware border. The regional center will be located in New York City.

In the southeast we are expanding the responsibility of the South Florida Task Force. It will extend up the east coast to the Maryland/Delaware border and up the west coast of Florida to about Appalachicola. Miami will remain the center for this region.

The Gulf region will run from Appalachicola to Brownsville, Texas, and New Orleans will be the regional center.

The southwest border region will extend from Brownsville, Texas, to the Colorado River and the regional center will be El Paso.

On the west coast, the region will include the coast of California, Oregon, and Washington, in addition to Alaska, Hawaii, and the waters of the Pacific. The regional center will be located in Long Beach, California.

Finally, the north border region will run from the State of Washington to Erie, Pennsylvania, and the center will be located in Chicago.

There are unique enforcement problems in each of those areas. The most serious drug trade in the northeast is the smuggling of heroin, especially in the port city of New York. The smuggling tactics used there are completely different from those utilized in south Florida. Heroin is smuggled in very small amounts, concealed in ship containers, aircargo, or carried personally by individuals. Counteracting heroin smuggling requires manpower-intensive operations by undercover agents and substantial assistance from the highly skilled local police of New York City. The key to heroin detection, however, is improved intelligence. Improved intelligence is necessary in all major port cities where the detection of illegal drugs is extremely difficult. The other major drug threat in the northeast comes from what are known as "motherships"—ships laden with tons of marijuana that weave their way north, up the east coast of the United States from Colombia. In this area the interdiction efforts that we have found so successful in south Florida will be fully utilized.

We will use Navy patrol planes out of Brunswick, Maine, and Navy ships out of Newport, Rhode Island. They will be coordinated with Coast Guard cutters and Coast Guard and Customs aircraft and Navy radar planes.

In the southeast region, which includes south Florida, we will continue to attack the problem with the combined forces of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and the Marines in cooperation with U.S. Customs, the Coast Guard, and additional assistance from DEA aircraft.

In the Gulf region, marijuana ships penetrate the Yucatan staying close to the coasts of Mexico and Cuba. Aircraft also penetrate the Gulf coast on flights from Colombia and Central America. To determine the extent of smuggling efforts in the Gulf region our operations are designed to determine the flow of traffic on the sea and in the air. Our tactics for interdiction and the force required to stop it may be similar to those forces used in south Florida.

On the southwest border, we have recently detected an increase in the smuggling of brown heroin and a vastly improved grade of marijuana along with overflights of this border by cocaine smugglers. Our efforts will first focus on detecting smugglers who literally walk or drive over isolated areas of the border, in addition to detecting U.S. aircraft flying south to load up with dope for return flight to the United States. We will also move surveillance assets to cover the low altitude routes to interdict the larger aircraft flying drugs from Colombia. Our interdiction battle in this region will be supported by airborne radar, Marine Corps interceptors, and helicopters manned by law enforcement officials who will make the actual arrests.

The west coast represents our most difficult and challenging tactical problem. Ships carrying Thai sticks, a very high grade of marijuana, work their way across the Pacific on great circle routes and approach the west coast from the North. Marijuana grown in Hawaii or other drugs transshipped through that island State find their way to the mainland from the West. An increased flow of cocaine and marijuana from the west coast of Colombia approaches the United States from the South and much of the cocaine that gets into Florida is driven across country in trucks and cars approaching the west coast from the East. So you can see that we have a threat from 360 degrees that includes all types of drugs, in every conceivable kind of conveyance. To address this problem we can rely on many of the tactics we used in south Florida, that is radar aircraft, patrol planes, surface vessels, and certainly improved intelligence.

On our northern border the trade is mainly heroin. It's first smuggled into Canada and then moved into the United States. We will be working closely with Canadian authorities to improve our detection capabilities along this extensive land mass.

Operations have already begun in each region. It's happening now.

The National Narcotics Border Interdiction System will work in unison with the Attorney General's 12 Organized Crime Task Forces that the President established in January of this year.[9] The primary goal of the Attorney General's efforts is to bring to justice the men and women at the highest levels of drug and other criminal organizations. Last week the GAO report criticized our efforts because of the lack of success in this area. Let me just say that criminal conspiracy cases take time to develop, and the Godfathers of major drug organizations are highly insulated. The investigation, apprehension and prosecution of these individuals take time and tedious effort. But the Attorney General's resolve in this area will not be broken and I can assure you that the interdiction efforts that I have announced today will be completely coordinated with the Attorney General's Task Forces. Our efforts will be mutually supportive and by closer coordination and cooperation, we will begin to close the existing gaps in our fight against drug trafficking.

[9] The President actually announced the Drug Task Force Program and other drug enforcement initiatives on October 14, 1982. The Task Force Program was formally provided resources by P.L. 97-377, the Continuing Appropriations for 1983, enacted on December 21, 1982. Congress outlined requirements in the House and Senate Appropriations Conference Committee Report, December 20, 1982. The January reference alludes to the date at which the Attorney General codified these requirements in Guidelines for the Drug Enforcement Task Forces, thus making the program effective January 20, 1983. The "Attorney General's Twelve Organized Crime Task Forces" refers to a crime task force for each of the 12 following geographic regions: Great Lakes, Gulf Coast, Los Angeles-Nevada, Mid-Atlantic, Mountain, New England, New York-New Jersey, North Central, Northwest, South Central, Southeast, and Southwest. Florida comprises a separate task force program. See also The Annual Report of the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force Program, Department of Justice (Washington, 1984).

I want to make one final announcement. In each of our regional headquarters, we have established as of today an operations information center. These centers will have highly skilled professionals assigned from all of our agencies including the FBI, the DEA, Customs and Coast Guard, the Army, Navy, Air Force, and the Marines, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and the intelligence community of the United States. We will gather and analyze intelligence. We will assess the local threat. We will assign priorities to interdiction targets, identify our resources, recommend the most effective action to be taken and provide all coordination for joint special operations.

With the assistance of Defense Secretary Weinberger, we will bring more military support to our cause. With the help and support of CIA Director, Bill Casey, and the entire intelligence community, we expect to be better informed and more knowledgeable regarding the actions and activities of smugglers in order to position our resources in the right place at the right time.

We in the administration are not unaware of the difficulty of our task. But our efforts are both innovative and substantial. The use of U.S. military resources provides us with an imposing presence in the air and especially on the high seas. The cooperation and coordination of the intelligence community is another arrow in our quiver. But despite all of these things, we must recognize that the thousands of men and women employed in this massive effort need the assistance and support of an aware and alarmed citizenry. The economic cost and the social destruction is too grave for this nation to conduct business as usual in the war against drugs.

The President and members of his administration fully recognize the threat. Despite the resources that we have brought to this cause, we need leadership, understanding, and guidance from parents and community leaders and from public officials throughout the country. No one agency, no one department, State, or region can successfully win the battle alone. We must all work together to make a real impact against this insidious threat to our country. While we ask for your patience and your understanding, more importantly we ask for your active support.

Thank you very much.

Statement by the Representative (DiCarlo) in the Third Committee of the U.N. General Assembly, November 18, 1983 (Extract) [10]

The International Campaign Against Traffic in Drugs

. . . . . .

What can we do about the serious nature of the international drug problem? We would like to raise a few of many possible ways of addressing this question for consideration.

First, experience has shown that the control of illicit drugs is most effective and efficient at its source—through government bans or limits on cultivation, enforced by crop eradication, and backed by interdiction programs. This has been proven in a number of countries. For example, the Government of Turkey has banned the cultivation of poppies for the production of opium. A similar ban was announced last year in Pakistan, backed by the eradication of remaining illicit crops this year. The Government of Mexico has an ongoing campaign of aerial spraying of herbicides against the cultivation of both opium poppy and cannabis which has been effective in decreasing the overall amount of heroin and marijuana available for the illicit market. The Government of the Socialist Republic of Burma, despite the problems of insurgencies in much of the opium poppy growing areas, eradicate 8,000 to 10,500 acres annually. The Governments of Belize and Mexico have joined together in an unprecedented cooperative effort to eliminate drug crops; over 1,200 acres of marijuana were eradicated last month in Belize.

Second, such crucial and commendable actions against the production of drugs require greater support and financial resources from the international community.

[10] Source: U.S. Mission to the United Nations Press Release USUN 149-(83), November 18, 1983. Omitted from DiCarlo's statement is his introductory survey on the scope of the international drug problem.

We believe a substantial breakthrough occurred last week when the Italian Government announced its contribution of $40 million to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control over 5 years. This contribution not only doubles UNFDAC's annual budget, but marks a much needed involvement by the United Nations in the effort to control production of cocaine. We hope that other nations will follow this lead in devoting more resources to the drug control effort.

Third, while the control of illicit crops requires increased expenditures, money is not necessarily the most important factor. Commitment to eliminate the international drug problem must be made by drug producing countries, and by other members of the international community.

Mr. Chairman, we believe all nations should promote narcotics control as a foreign policy priority, and make it an important issue in bilateral relations with drug producing nations. The drug problem should be raised in official visits, not only among health and social ministries, but in the economic and foreign ministries as well. The burdens of successfully eliminating drugs at the source should be supported by the entire global community. Without this support, it is harder for governments to implement the often politically difficult, but necessary crop control measures within their borders. If few nations support these efforts, these governments are often accused of yielding to "pressure" from those nations which encourage crop control, rather than responding to the concerns of the international community as a whole.

If we are serious about stopping the supply of illicit drugs, we need to back the commitment to eliminate drugs with rigor. One step in that direction is to link drug-related economic assistance with a strong commitment to narcotics control on the part of producing countries. We are pleased that this concept was incorporated by the World Food Program [11] in a rural development project in Pakistan, and hope that this practice will be made the rule rather than the exception in other international narcotics programs.

Finally, we are all aware that narcotic crops are found most often in remote, isolated areas, making crop control a logistically burdensome task. Many experts agree that eradication through the responsible use of herbicides is the best means to address the cultivation of these crops. In 1979, a Study Group convened by the U.N. Division of Narcotic Drugs stated that the use of chemicals to eradicate illicit narcotic crops presented the best overall opportunity to successfully destroy these crops. We urge the U.N. organizations and Member States to incorporate this recommendation in their fight against the production of illicit crops.

Mr. Chairman, the United States believes the U.N. specialized agencies, organizations, and programs must raise their priority and attention to the drug control problem. In the Secretary-General's Report on international cooperation in drug abuse control, Document A/38/522, it is clear that many of the U.N. organizations have been active in the drug control area by virtue of the funding received from the U.N. Fund for Drug Abuse Control. When the Fund was created in 1971, its purpose was to provide an additional source of assistance to augment the drug control efforts of the U.N. system. While we are aware of the fiscal austerity under which the United Nations must operate, we are concerned that the Fund has been regarded as a source of funding to replace rather than increase resources for drug control activities which are legitimate activities of the U.N. agencies; we urge those agencies to adjust their priorities in order to increase attention to this problem within their program mandates.

The Secretary-General's report notes that the various U.N. agencies conducting activities in the drug control area met in two ad hoc meetings, but we regret there is no indication of what was discussed or accomplished at the meeting. Given the finite budgetary resources which the United Nations has available to address the international drug problem, we believe these meetings are necessary to ensure coordination of efforts. We hope that the results of such meetings will be conveyed in future General Assembly reports on international drug control, and to the various U.N. policymaking bodies in this area. We regret the nonparticipation in these meetings of two U.N. specialized agencies. Given the significant impact of drug trafficking and drug abuse on the world's youth, and upon the development of nations, we believe the participation of these agencies in the international battle against the drug problem is appropriate and necessary.

We are also concerned about the two U.N. Industrial Organization (UNIDO) projects outlined in the report; one concerning a study to assess the industrial utilization of the coca bush and the other studying the industrial utilization of surplus opiate stocks for the production of codeine in developing countries. We believe these proposals would counter plans and efforts to curtail the production of illicit narcotic drugs. The promotion of additional licit uses of coca and opium poppies, if they exist, could have the disastrous effect of encouraging nations who are not traditional suppliers to expand cultivation, and increase the potential of diversion to illicit markets. We hope these proposals, which contain provisions contrary to the policies of the U.N. Commission on Narcotic Drugs and the International Narcotics Control Board, will not be undertaken without the prior agreement of the competent U.N. drug agencies.

I would also like to comment on the "Report of the Secretary General on the International Campaign Against Traffic in Drugs". [12] Most of the activities outlined in this report have been meetings and seminars which bring together members of law enforcement agencies on a regional basis. International cooperation among these agencies, traditionally the most active and dedicated in the fight against drugs, has improved, in part, due to the various seminars and meetings which have been held under the auspices of the United Nations.

We recognize the utility of bringing enforcement officials together, and hope that future meetings will also focus on specific enforcement problems, techniques, and strategies which will increase the capabilities of the participants to interdict illicit drug trafficking. While these regional meetings are useful, we are not convinced that there is a need for an interregional law enforcement meeting in 1986. The advantages or purposes for such a meeting are far outweighed by other pressing priorities in the law enforcement area. We also believe that U.N. regional enforcement coordination offices are unnecessary. Such offices have been tried in the past and have not been found to be effective.

Mr. Chairman, the United States was pleased to join the other members of the Economic and Social Council in endorsing the recommendation that the Commission on Narcotic Drugs function as a task force to oversee the implementation of the strategy. If the Assembly agrees to this approach, we believe that the agenda for the 8th Special Session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs will need to include a review of the implementation of the Strategy so that the Commission may begin its task force functions.

In closing, let me emphasize that no nation is "doing enough" to control narcotics. If our goal in international narcotics is to reduce the availability of and demand for illicit drugs, then we must treat the international drug problem in a realistic manner. Drug control must have the high priority and commitment it deserves on the multinational level. This commitment must be backed by firm efforts to prohibit the continued cultivation of drug crops, and the resources to support such resolve. Efficient and effective methods of eliminating the drug scourge at its source, such as the responsible use of herbicides, must be pursued.

Only when we take such measures and treat the international drug problem as we treat other menaces to our countries will we be on the road to success.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Document 127

Statement by the Director of the U.S. Information Agency (Wick) Before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, March 2, 1983 [1]

U.S. Participation in "The Competition for Ideas"

I am pleased to be here today to present the authorization request for the U.S. Information Agency for fiscal year 1984, as well as the supplemental request for fiscal year 1983.

This Agency's request in fiscal year 1984 totals $711.4 million, which is an increase of $113.8 million over the 1983 amounts already enacted or pending in supplementals. This is a large increase, but one which we believe is fully justified in the current world climate.

Today, as never before, we are engaged in a fierce competition of ideas. Our adversary is the Soviet Union. Our strengths are the truth and our own ideals. Today, in a world where freedom is under attack, the concept of human liberty and the concept of America are more compelling and attractive than ever. But, we cannot and must not remain passive. The stakes are too high.

This competition is not new. It has been going on since the end of World War II. Our strategy, however, has remained virtually unchanged. For far too long we have been in the position of reacting to the other side. It is time to take the initiative, to make our case boldly and well. It is time to recognize USIA as an important component of the American foreign affairs community. Indeed, USIA is on the cutting edge of the struggle for men's minds.

The Soviets are well equipped to wage a war of ideas, and have increased their efforts even more. They have also changed the nature of the war. I refer to their campaign of so-called active measures and disinformation directed against the United States.

Just a few weeks ago, on February 17, for example, the Washington Post reported that "The Soviet-supported Communist press in India has recently escalated its longstanding disinformation campaign against the United States." This is an apparent attempt to turn the Third World against us before the start of the nonaligned nations summit, to be held in New Delhi in March. [2]

That is only the tip of the iceberg, not only in India but throughout the world. The Soviet Union far outdistances us in resources—not merely in money, but in personnel and level of activity as well.

The Soviets focus on young people, and they not only attend but organize conferences of the world's youth. The Soviets aid local Communist parties around the world. A startling allegation is that the Soviets spend more on jamming our broadcasting the truth to the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe than the Voice of America's worldwide budget.

Radio Moscow has 37 state-of-the-art 500-kilowatt, superpower transmitters, while the Voice of America has 6, each made by coupling 2 250 kilowatts into a 500-kilowatt transmitter. Radio Free Europe [RFE] [3] and Radio Liberty [RL] have none. The Soviet Union broadcasts in 82 languages. VOA and Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty combined broadcast in 48 languages.

[3] All brackets are in the source text.

Frankly, in many areas we are behind in the competition of ideas. Unless we reinforce our efforts, we will continue to lose ground and our national interest will suffer. The Reagan administration understands this, and with the help of Congress, we can pull ahead and eventually win the struggle for ideas.

As to Project Democracy, about which there have been many questions, on June 8, 1982, President Reagan, in his address to the British Parliament, announced the intention of the United States to make a major effort to foster the infrastructure of democracy which allows a people to choose their own way, to develop their own differences through peaceful means. [4]

The President thus laid the groundwork for a long-term, positive program by the United States to advocate the principles of democracy and to support those people and institutions committed to democratic development. The United States will help build and reinforce the bonds based on shared values between our peoples and other nations.

Project Democracy will be a bipartisan venture, involving both government and private organizations. All Americans have an interest in promoting freedom and democracy throughout the world, and Project Democracy will work with a wide range of organizations and institutions to build linkages with foreign counterparts.

Political parties, unions, businesses, universities, State and local governments, media, service organizations, women's groups, ethnic and religious organizations, working with their counterparts overseas, may prove to be the most effective means of strengthening democracy and promoting friendship and cooperation with other nations.

Ambassador Helman [5] handed me, just before I started, something that addresses one of the key questions which has been raised regarding Project Democracy, and I state as follows:

"For clarity of presentation, we have included in the Democracy Project several programs which were formerly carried in the budgets of other agencies. A case in point is the Asia Foundation, which had been funded through State.

"I want you to know that including such programs in the Democracy Project will not affect their management. The Asia Foundation, for example, will still be managed through State.

"Nor will it affect the integrity of those programs. They have functioned very well, and we intend to assure that will continue to be the case.

"Moreover, we will develop and monitor those programs with an eye to the political health and credibility of the organizations involved. We do not intend trying to fix things which are not broken.

"In that connection, I call your attention to what Secretary Shultz told Mr. Fascell's subcommittee last week, that the foreign policy considerations involved in these programs transcend any single agency and therefore, by Presidential directive, they will be the concern of an interagency committee. [6]

"Finally, and of central importance, is our conviction that what we are proposing is of broad bipartisan concern. This is not a slogan, but a reality. If this project is to have meaning, it must have broad bi-partisan support because it is one which we want to see continue from our administration to the next and onward.

"What this means, among other things, is that we welcome your ideas as well as your support both in the development of the project and its implementation. We will keep no secrets. We want to move ahead through mutual support and mutual confidence."

Back to my prepared remarks.

At the same time we are seeking to develop new and innovative exchange programs which utilize the resources of the private sector as well as the government. For example, the President's International Youth Exchange initiative, a project already underway, is designed to reach the successor generation of the Versailles economic summit countries.

[5] Gerald Helman, Deputy to the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, and Director, Office of Public Diplomacy, Department of State.

[6] See document 130. The Presidential directive is not further identified.

President Reagan announced this initiative in May of 1982,[7] and it has the enthusiastic support of the heads of state of Canada, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, and the United Kingdom. Over the next 3 years youth exchanges will be increased by 15,000.

President Reagan has established from the private sector a Council for International Youth Exchange to encourage the American private sector to join in a partnership to help promote the initiative. The council is made up of top corporate executives and education and foundation leaders from across America. It is a classic free enterprise undertaking between the private sector and the government.

The council has pledged to raise $10 million to match the U.S. Government's contribution of a like amount over the next 3 years. The council is already well on the way to achieving its goal. It has received donations of over $2 million. The President's International Youth Exchange initiative buttresses the Agency's ongoing exchange programs, filling a long neglected gap in international exchange efforts.

As to radio, it is our most neglected activity. Over the years, VOA has added a language program here, a few staff people there. However, the physical plant required to transmit America's voice to the world is in deplorable condition, affecting the vitality and quality of its voice.

On July 19 of last year, the President announced that "We intend to move forward consistent with budgetary requirements with a program to modernize our primary means of international communication, our international radio system." At that time, he observed that "The Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, and Radio Liberty have been neglected for many years. Their equipment is old and deteriorating, their program resources strained. Little has been done to counter the jamming that has intensified in recent years."[8]

This past year has seen a continued and concerted effort at the Voice of America to enhance its reputation for reliability, objectivity, and balance. We are seeking to communicate the "voices of America" by broadcasting information showing the diversity and plurality of this Nation.

An increased amount of editorial opinion to explain America's policies to people in other countries is being broadcast. VOA has established an office of audience relations to promote overseas awareness of VOA, and to analyze audience reaction to VOA programs. It is our intention to make programs more relevant and interesting to VOA's listenership.

Extensive efforts to carry administration messages through the use of satellite television transmissions directly to foreign audiences without distortion or filtering has been made possible through the communications technological revolution. Presidential speeches and video dialogs with Cabinet officers are being transmitted by satellite. Satellite television is now in the forefront of our public diplomatic efforts in support of American policies.

Additional funds are desperately needed to hire trained engineers. The task of structuring, almost from the ground up, a comprehensive, worldwide radio transmission system is formidable.

Professionals are being recruited to fill the many existing vacancies in our engineering division and to staff the new positions requested in our supplemental proposal. VOA engineering's first task will be to carry out a comprehensive systems analysis of the components of the worldwide VOA communications network: Antennas, technical transmission requirements, power generation systems, the requirements for a worldwide operations center and network control, and an investigation into station characteristics and locations to fill existing coverage gaps.

With the benefit of such a comprehensive study we will be able to make decisions about new VOA construction projects that will be most efficient and more cost effective.

USIA is mandated to tell the truth about the policies and objectives of the United States to the world and at the same time to counter the Soviet Union's growing global campaign of propaganda and distortion. USIA is fulfilling these directives by initiating innovative projects and by strengthening the traditional programs that have continued to prove effective.

During the past year we were able to begin the long-sought agency move to our new USIA building. This consolidation of most of the Agency will have a beneficial effect on the efficiency of all Agency elements.

Having discussed some of our program highlights, I would now like to briefly discuss the Agency's resource requests.

The Further Continuing Appropriations Act, Public Law 97-377, [9] provides $545.4 million for USIA programs in fiscal year 1983. Within that amount, we plan to shift resources in the radio construction and salaries and expense accounts to cover several new urgent requirements, primarily to conduct engineering analyses to identify and examine the overall technical performance requirements of the Voice of America's worldwide transmitting facilities; to develop a fiscal year 1983 spending plan for private sector exchange programs to meet the intent of the Further Continuing Appropriations Act; and to absorb the costs of consolidating USIA offices in Washington, to continue and expand the President's Youth Exchange Initiative, and to provide for other priority program requirements.

The Agency is also seeking fiscal year 1983 supplemental appropriations of $52.2 million, consisting of $9.5 million for Federal pay raise and benefit costs; $22.7 million to correct deficiencies in Voice of America staff and program operations; and $20 million to launch Project Democracy. The latter requires additional authorization legislation for fiscal year 1983.

The Agency's 1984 request for authorization of appropriations totals $711.4 million, an increase of $113.8 million over the amount provided by the 1983 Further Continuing Appropriations Act for comparable programs and pending supplementals. This increase will enable the Agency to serve the Nation's security interests more effectively and will meet the following major requirements: $50.8 million to cover full-year requirements of the Voice of America improvements and Project Democracy that will be initiated under the proposed 1983 supplementals; $23.1 million to perform advanced engineering and technical development studies to initiate a 5-year plan to modernize and expand the Voice of America's transmitting facilities; $21.4 million to meet projected 1984 inflationary increases and other mandatory changes for all Agency programs and activities; and $18.5 million to enhance other Agency priority programs, principally overseas mission posts, television and satellite programs, VOA broadcasts to the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, youth exchange programs, wireless file reception, and research studies.

We are proposing a small number of administrative changes. One concerns section 305(c) of the U.S. Information Agency Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1982 and 1983, [10] which mandated the doubling of certain exchange-of-persons programs by fiscal year 1986.

Competing program priorities render that requirement imprudent in light of overall budget constraints. As the 1985 and 1986 estimates are now projected, program increases in exchanges could come only at the expense of vital VOA and other national security programs of the Agency.

As the President noted when he signed the authorizing legislation, adjustments are deemed necessary. [11] We are proposing language that would remove the doubling requirement but would guarantee that the fiscal year 1982 exchange-of-persons program level would be maintained or enhanced in the future. As this budget presentation indicates, increases have in fact been made in exchange-of-persons programs in fiscal year 1983 and further sizable increases are proposed for 1984.

Mr. Chairman [12] and members of the committee, free and open societies are in danger. The ideals and values which underlie our national purposes are under attack by a potent Soviet propaganda and disinformation campaign.

USIA, a critical component of this country's national security apparatus, must meet the challenge. The administration recognizes this and the vital need for this

Address by President Reagan, September 10, 1983 [13]

"The Truth Is Still Our Strongest Weapon"

My fellow Americans: During my first press conference, 9 days after being sworn in as your President, I was asked a question having to do with Soviet intentions. In my answer, I cited their own words, that they have openly and publicly declared the only morality they recognize is what will further world communism, that they reserve unto themselves the right to commit any crime, to lie, to cheat, in order to attain that. And I pointed out that we should keep this in mind when we deal with them. [14]

I was charged with being too harsh in my language. I tried to point out I was only quoting their own words. Well, I hope the Soviet's recent behavior will dispel any lingering doubt about what kind of regime we are dealing with and what our responsibilities are as trustees of freedom and peace. Isn't it time for all of us to see the Soviet rulers as they are rather than as we would like them to be?

Rather than tell the truth about the Korean Airlines massacre, [15] rather than immediately and publicly investigate the crash, explain to the world how it happened, punish those guilty of the crime, cooperate in efforts to find the wreckage, recover the bodies, apologize and offer compensation to the families, and work to prevent a repetition, they have done the opposite. They have stonewalled the world, mobilizing their entire government behind a massive cover-up, then brazenly threatening to kill more men, women, and children should another civilian airliner make the same mistake as KAL 007.

The Soviets are terrified of the truth. They understand well and they dread the meaning of St. John's words, "You will know the truth, and the truth will set you free." The truth is mankind's best hope for a better world. That's why in times like this, few assets are more important than the Voice of America and Radio Liberty, our primary means of getting the truth to the Russian people.

Within minutes of the report of the Soviet destruction of the Korean jet, the Voice of America aired the story in its news programs around the globe. We made sure people in Africa, Asia, the Middle East, Europe, and, most important, the people in the Soviet bloc itself knew the truth. That includes every Soviet misstatement, from their initial denials through all the tortured changes and contradictions in their story, including their UN representative still denying they shot down the plane even as his own government was finally admitting they did.

Accurate news like this is about as welcome as the plague among the Soviet elite. Censorship is as natural and necessary to the survival of their dictatorship as free speech is to our democracy. That's why they devote such enormous resources to block our broadcast inside Soviet-controlled countries. The Soviets spend more to block Western broadcasts coming into those countries than the entire worldwide budget of the Voice of America.

To get the news across to the Russian people about the Korean Airlines massacre, the Voice of America added new frequencies and new broadcast times. But within minutes of those changes, new Soviet jamming began. Luckily, jamming is more like a sieve than a wall. International radio broadcasts can still get through to many people with the news. But we still face enormous difficulties.

One of the Voice of America's listeners in the Middle East wrote, "If you do not strengthen your broadcasting frequencies, no one can get anything from your program." Our radio equipment is just plain old, some of it World War II vintage. I don't mind people getting older; it's just not so good for machines.

More than 35 percent of the Voice of America's transmitters are over 30 years old. We have a similar problem at Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. We have 6 antiquated 500-kilowatt shortwave transmitters. The Soviets have 37, and theirs are neither old nor outdated. We regularly receive complaints that Soviet broadcasts are clearer than ours. One person wrote and asked why it's not possible for a Nation that can send ships into space to have its own voice heard here on Earth.

The answer is simple. We are as far behind the Soviets and their allies in international broadcasting today as we were in space when they launched Sputnik in 1957.

We have repeatedly urged the Congress to support our long-term modernization program and our proposal for a new radio station, Radio Marti, for broadcasting to Cuba. The sums involved are modest, but for whatever reason this critical program has not been enacted.

Today I am appealing to the Congress, help us get the truth through. Help us strengthen our international broadcasting effort by supporting increased funding for the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, Radio Liberty, and by authorizing the establishment of Radio Marti.

And I appeal to you, especially those of you who came from Eastern Europe, Russia, and Soviet-dominated countries, who understand how crucial this issue is, let your representatives hear from you. Tell them you want Soviet rulers held accountable for their actions even by their own people. The truth is still our strongest weapon. We just have to use it.

Finally, let us come together as a Nation tomorrow in a National Day of Mourning to share the sorrow of the families, and let us resolve that this crime against humanity will never be forgotten anywhere in the world.

Until next week, thank you for listening, and God bless you.

"The Strength of Our Common Democratic Values"

. . . . . .

But let us turn briefly to the international arena. America's leadership in the world came to us because of our own strength and because of the values which guide us as a society: free elections, a free press, freedom of religious choice, free trade unions, and above all, freedom for the individual and rejection of the arbitrary power of the state. These values are the bedrock of our strength. They unite us in a stewardship of peace and freedom with our allies and friends in NATO, in Asia, in Latin America, and elsewhere. They are also the values which in the recent past some among us had begun to doubt and view with a cynical eye.

Fortunately, we and our allies have rediscovered the strength of our common democratic values, and we're applying them as a cornerstone of a comprehensive strategy for peace with freedom. In London last year, I announced the commitment of the United States to developing the infrastructure of democracy throughout the world.[2] We intend to pursue this democratic initiative vigorously. The future belongs not to governments and ideologies which oppress their peoples, but to democratic systems of self-government which encourage individual initiative and guarantee personal freedom.

Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 23, 1983 (Extracts)[3]

Outline of Project Democracy

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate your opening comments about the importance of the management of this enterprise. It contains a great many people of extraordinary talent, and one way of looking at the job I have is to see to it that we use that talent in the most effective way possible on the one hand, and on the other, to be sure that there is a continuing stream of talent in and being trained and developed so that 20 and 30 years from now we have continued to build that firm base of personnel that is so necessary.

I appreciate the opportunity to meet with you to begin discussion of the Department of State authorization request for fiscal years 1984 and 1985. Of all my appearances before Congress, Mr. Chairman, none is more important. Indeed, our success in the world depends on our willingness to allocate the resources necessary to support a foreign policy worthy of our traditions and the role we must play in today's world.

I believe I know as well as anyone the competition for our Nation's resources. I also understand the inevitable trade-offs between our domestic and international priorities that are a part of that process.

I firmly believe, however, that just as we cannot compromise on funding vital to America's defense, it is equally important that our diplomatic efforts receive the resources essential for their success. Indeed, to the extent that we succeed diplomatically in assuring the security and well-being of ourselves, our friends and our allies, our military strength need never be tested.

Our Nation's foreign policy agenda, Mr. Chairman, is a very ambitious one. Three broad goals dominate that agenda, goals which are at once interdependent and mutually reinforcing.

The first goal is our commitment to a more peaceful, secure world, where countries are free to pursue peaceful change and to realize their political and economic aspirations safe from threats or intimidation.

To address this goal, President Reagan is moving decisively to restore our military strength, to negotiate on disarmament and arms control, and to act decisively and imaginatively to help make peace a reality in regions of the world which have known only anguish and strife for generations.

The second goal is to restore order and stability to the international economic system by recognizing that our own domestic and foreign economic policies must interact effectively to achieve sustainable, noninflationary growth.

A third goal is the President's commitment to expanding the forces of democracy and freedom. Last June, in a speech to the British Parliament, the President pointed out the need to move decisively to strengthen the infrastructure of democracy—a free press, free trade unions, free political parties—institutions which allow people to determine their own future. I will return to this topic later in my statement.

. . . . . .

Finally, Mr. Chairman, let me introduce a program that is not in the State Department budget, but which is of high importance to U.S. foreign policy. The President has indicated his strong interest in Project Democracy, in his State of the Union Address. [4] We are requesting that it be funded in the USIA budget at $65 million in fiscal year 1984. Charles Wick will be discussing it further with you at a later date.

This program represents a major step toward the implementation of the President's London commitment to strengthen democracy and democratic institutions abroad. It is based on a few principal assumptions:

The growth of democracy is essential to the achievement of our key international goals: peace, prosperity, and respect for human rights.

Democracy is a vital force, existing as an expression of the basic drive for freedom. Though its form may differ due to culture and history, its principles are valid worldwide.

In many cases, the advocates of democracy will need help. It is up to the established democracies to provide it.

This support should be open. We need not feel inhibited about advocating what we know to be the best governmental system available.

The President's program emphasizes five areas: leadership training, strengthening the institutions of democracy, education, conveying ideas and information, and developing closer ties between American organizations and individuals and their foreign counterparts. It builds upon current U.S. Government programs and increases support to organizations with a proven track record, such as labor and the Asia Foundation. It contains new proposals and concepts. Finally, it emphasizes institutions and practices that will enhance the long-term protection of human rights.

The program represents what the Federal Government hopes to do in the next year. But Government can accomplish little alone. The strengthening of the forces of democracy abroad must be an effort of all Americans. We thus are looking forward to the recommendations of the independent, bipartisan study by the American Political Foundation of how American nongovernmental organizations can help strengthen democracy abroad. [5] I am gratified, Mr. Chairman, that you are playing a key role in guiding this study.

The democracy project has great promise as an expression of what is most fundamental in American political life and belief. It is inspired by idealism, but also by hardheaded realism about what will best promote international cooperation and stability and respect for human rights.

This is a project of great urgency. Democracy is the present as well as the future. I ask the committee to work with us to give the United States a much needed capability to support the proponents and institutions of democracy abroad. This has to be a consistent, long-term effort. It must be a bipartisan effort. We cannot work miracles overnight. But we must start now.

Mr. Chairman, I am submitting for the record a fuller presentation of our views on Project Democracy, which I submitted to you.

Now I will be glad to try to answer your questions.

MR. FASCELL. Thank you very much, Mr. Secretary.

Without objection the fuller statement on Project Democracy will be included in the record. [6]

Statement by President Reagan, December 16, 1983 [1]

Establishment of the National Endowment for Democracy

Thank you very much. Good morning and welcome. It is good to have you all here to help celebrate the launching of a program with a vision and a noble purpose.

The National Endowment for Democracy is, just as we've been told, more than bipartisan; it is a genuine partnership of Republicans and Democrats, of labor and business, conservatives and liberals, and of the executive and legislative branches of government.

It is such a worthwhile, important initiative that I'm tempted to ask: Why hasn't it been done before?

But we are doing it now, and it is largely because of the hard work of good people. Chuck Manatt, Frank Fahrenkopf, Dante Fascell, Bill Brock, Lane Kirkland, Mike Samuels, you have my heartfelt thanks and warmest congratulations. And a special thank you to our Vice President who has been carrying this message for quite some time now on missions here and there throughout the world.

The establishment of the National Endowment goes right to the heart of America's faith in democratic ideals and institutions. It offers hope to people everywhere.

Last year in London I spoke of the need and obligation to assist democratic development. My hope then was that America would make clear to those who cherish democracy throughout the world that we mean what we say.

What had been preying on my mind that prompted me to say that in that speech to the Parliament was that in my lifetime, my adult lifetime, the world has been beset by "isms". And we remember one of those "isms" that plunged us into a war. And it suddenly dawned on me that we, with this system that so apparently works and is successful, have just assumed that the people would look at it and see that it was the way to go. Then I realized that all of those "isms", they also are missionaries for their cause, and they are out worldwide trying to sell it. And I just decided that this nation with its heritage of Yankee traders, we ought to do a little selling of the principles of democracy.

Speaking out for human rights and individual liberty, and for the role of—the rule of law and the peaceful reconciliation of differences, for democratic values, principles are good and right. But it's not just good enough. We must work hard for democracy and freedom and that means putting our resources, organizations, sweat, and dollars behind a long-term program.

Well, the hope is now a reality. The National Endowment for Democracy, a private, nonprofit corporation funded by the Congress, will be the centerpiece of this effort. All Americans can be proud of this initiative and the congressional action which made it possible.

By engaging the energies of our major political parties, of labor, business and other groups, such as the academic community, the forces of democracy will be strengthened wherever they may be. They'll have a caring group of Americans to go to to get assistance from, advice and cooperation.

This program will not be hidden in shadows. It will stand proudly in the spotlight and that's where it belongs. We can and should be proud of our message of democracy. Democracies respect individual liberties and human rights. They respect freedom of expression, political participation, and peaceful cooperation; governments which serve their citizens in courage, spiritual and economic vitality. And we will not be shy in offering this message of hope.

Through the National Endowment, the private sector will promote exchanges between the American people and democratic groups abroad. It will stimulate participation in democratic training programs and institution building overseas. The Endowment will work closely with those abroad who seek to chart a democratic course, and all this work will be sensitive to the needs of individual groups and institutions. And, of course, it will be consistent with our own national interests.

The National Endowment will let the people at the grass roots who make our democracy work, help build it elsewhere. The organizations that are now being formed by the Republican and Democratic Parties and by labor and business will be the key to success. There'll also be expressions of what's best and most valuable in American public life.

Now, we're not naive. We're not trying to create imitations of the American system around the world. There's no simple cookbook recipe for political development that is right for all people, and there's no timetable. While democratic principles and basic institutions are universal, democratic development must take into account historic, cultural, and social conditions. Each nation, each movement will find its own route. And, in the process, we'll learn much of value for ourselves. Patience and respect for different political and cultural traditions will be the hallmark of our effort. But the combination of our ideas is healthy. And it's in this spirit that the National Endowment reaches out to people everywhere—and will reach out to those who can make a difference, and to those who will guide the destiny of their people in the future.

Much depends on us. But we can be confident that the tide of history is a freedom tide. That's the real message of our time. And it may be just the reason why those who don't like to hear the truth are so worried.

The nine countries which joined the United Nations since 1978 are democracies. In Africa, important states like Nigeria and Senegal have entered fully into the community of democratic states. In our hemisphere, 27 out of 35 countries are democracies now, or in transition. And just last week, Argentina completed its dramatic return, with the inauguration of President Alfonsin.

Yes, beyond the world's trouble spot lies a deeper, more positive, and hopeful trend. The march of democracy and the National Endowment will be a part of it. Of course, any undertaking will ultimately be judged by the challenges it accepts and those that it overcomes. All of you in this room have good reason to be proud. You've accepted a worthy challenge.

The National Endowment for Democracy can make lasting and important contributions. It's up to all of us to make it happen, to harness the resources, experience, and wisdom of both the public and the private sectors. It's up to us to broaden our efforts, make them grow. And with the people in this room, I know we can; and I know we will.

So, again, thank you. Good luck. And God bless all of you. (Applause)

President's International Youth Exchange Initiative

THE PRESIDENT. (Applause.) Thank you very much.

First, I want to welcome you and thank you for taking time from your busy schedules to come to Washington. These remarks are, also, being videotaped for the Williamsburg Conference for International Youth Exchange. [2] So to all of you attending that conference, let me extend a welcome.

This is such a distinguished group, both here and in Williamsburg, perhaps I should not tell the story of the mama mouse who was trying to teach her offspring the ways of the world, and found herself one day—and her family—face-to-face with a great, big cat. And she was a smart little mouse, though. So she started barking like a dog. And the cat, of course, turned tail, and headed for where it came from. She turned to her little ones, and the mama mouse said—"Now, you see; that is the importance of a second language." (Laughter.)

Aren't you fellows going to sit down?

We do need a second language—a language of understanding. Two years ago today, I took the Oath of Office. And in my remarks, I said that—"Peace is the highest aspiration of the American people. We will negotiate for it, sacrifice for it;" [3] I still believe deeply in those words. And the best way, the only way to that peace is through understanding among nations.

Some of you may remember what Winston Churchill said of the United States following World War II. "What other nation in history, when it became supremely powerful, has had no thought of territorial aggrandizement, no ambition but to use its resources for the good of the world." I think that was one of the finest chapters in our history. And we have every reason to be proud.

But today, almost 40 years later, there are many in the world—especially young people—who have no personal memory of that period, who do not understand America and what she represents. They do not know that America still possesses that spirit that Churchill described. The lack of understanding is a serious problem for our future. And that is where you, the members of the President's Council for International Youth Exchange, enter the picture. You and I strongly believe in the American ideal. We must trust our system and our values enough to know that young people from other countries, if they have a chance to visit us and live among us, will come to understand the American experience.

And there's another side to this idea. While we receive guests from other countries, we will also send our own young people to experience other cultures and to carry the American values to their host countries.

To help promote the exchange, last May I proposed the International Youth Exchange Initiative, which was endorsed by the leaders of the six other countries at the Versailles Economic Summit. [4] And I'm pleased that representatives of our Versailles partners could be here today.

I want to thank the members of the President's Inaugural Trust for the donation of a million dollars to the Youth Exchange Program. And I understand that almost another million has been—

MR. WICK: Full million.

THE PRESIDENT: What?

MR. WICK: Full million now, as of this afternoon.

THE PRESIDENT: It's 4 million?

MR. WICK: No, a full million.

THE PRESIDENT: A full million.

MR. WICK: We have 2 million of our own.

THE PRESIDENT: Yes, all right. (Laughter.) Sold to the gentleman in the gray chair. (Laughter.)

And I understand that another million has been pledged by Equitable Life, Atlantic Richfield, NVF, Phillips Industries, Time, Westinghouse, and Archer-Daniels-Midland. Now, how much does that make it?

MR. WICK: That's the million.

THE PRESIDENT: That's the million. Well—

MR. WICK: —recycling. (Laughter.)

THE PRESIDENT: I'm confident that these are the first of many donations from the private sector to reach our goal of $10 million over the next 3 years.

The Council's work underscores our strong belief in the private sector's role in building the bridges of understanding. Understanding cannot be measured, but our reward will come from those first awkward introductions when a young person meets his or her host family and just months later, when those teary-eyed goodbyes as friends part company. So, I thank you all for being part of this transformation of nations to individuals.

And just within the last few days, if I could add a little experience that I was not present to see but that others of our administration were. While we've been entertaining Prime Minister Nakasone of Japan, and at a dinner just recently, he and his wife and lovely daughter, he in a toast revealed that his daughter had been in such an exchange to the United States. And before he finished telling about what this experience had meant, his daughter was in tears and he was crying. And he also related, the young man who had been the exchange, or the family, and that he had seen them and that they, too, had shed tears on their happy memories of having their daughter in this country. And they felt the same way about the young man that had been in their home on the exchange. And it was—I just thought it was very convenient that this little experience had happened right now while we're meeting here.

But, again, I thank you all very much. And what this exchange does is carries out something I've long believed—the world will be all right if we all start talking to each other instead of about each other.

Thank you very much.

Address by the Director of the U.S. Information Agency (Wick), Before a Meeting on International Youth Exchange, Virginia, January 24, 1983 (Extracts) [5]

Organizations for International Youth Exchange

It is a pleasure to welcome you to historic Williamsburg for what I hope will be an historic conference.

As an American, I feel a strong sense of history, for Williamsburg, capital of Virginia over most of the 18th century, proved an ideological training ground while Thomas Jefferson, George Mason, and other patriots edged the 13 American Colonies toward independence. Verbal skirmishes in the House of Burgesses were echoed by the clash of muskets in nearby Yorktown.

So, visiting Williamsburg, I am again struck, not only by a sense of history, but by the legacy of self-government from these Tidewater lands: a belief in the necessity of responsible leadership and a commitment to public duty. Certainly all of you bring these attitudes to our deliberations.

. . . . . .

Just as during Williamsburg's halcyon days in the 18th century there was no office in the United States administering youth exchange, there does not now exist in Washington any central ministry for this purpose.

The Youth Exchange Staff in the U.S. Information Agency was created in response to President Reagan's call at the June 1982, Versailles Economic Summit for expanded international youth exchanges among our countries.[6] This office coordinates our international contacts and administers the program but continues to rely on corporate, foundation, and education leaders both for policy directions and for fund-raising. Toward that end, President Reagan has named a special council which convened for the first time 3 days ago to work toward the expansion of international youth exchange.

Another source of great strength on the U.S. side are the nongovernmental organizations and volunteer networks which, over the years, have played key roles in the administration and policy-formulation of exchange-of-persons programs. I am happy to see those entities represented here today. They will implement our initiative in the United States.

It is my great pleasure on behalf of my government and the President of the United States to welcome you here to this historic site. I have had the privilege of meeting with many of you in Paris in May and in the series of bilateral discussions leading up to this Williamsburg meeting. My aspirations are high and my spirits equally so as we begin this new effort at mutual understanding.

U.S. Efforts for International Exchange

Thank you very much, Mr. Hunt.[8]

I am happy to see Mr. Allaway—one of our President's Council members—here on the platform. Also Jack Egle,[9] who has worked closely with us through the years.

I particularly welcome our foreign representatives, including Ambassador Lahn[10] from the Federal Republic of Germany, who has made a special effort to be with us for this conference.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am pleased and proud to be able to report to you today that this administration stands solidly in support of international exchanges. In particular, the United States Information Agency—charged with the responsibility for many of our exchange programs—has vigorously sought increased funding for them. I am happy to say, the Congress has been forthcoming and far-sighted in its support. We are now engaged in an all-out effort to take the necessary steps to encourage expansions in international exchange. We will expend our funds well.

If all goes well, we may see an increase of 62 percent in the exchange budget in fiscal year 1984 over fiscal year 1982.

[7] Source: U.S. Information Agency files. Wick spoke at the Capitol Hilton Hotel in Washington. The theme of the conference was "Building Exchanges," with a special emphasis on the President's International Youth Exchange Initiative.

[8] Associate Executive Director, National Association of Secondary School Principals, presiding.

[9] Persons referred to are William Allaway, President of Education Abroad, and Jack Egle, Executive Director of the Council on International Educational Exchange.

[10] Lothar Lahn, Chief of the Cultural Division of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Germany.

There is, therefore, no doubt in my mind that a serious commitment has been made by all levels and all branches of this government and that significant steps have been taken to carry that commitment out.

Why?

I believe I reflect accurately the sense of the most experienced people in both the foreign affairs and the international exchange communities that there has been a decline in contacts of all kinds, at all levels. This must be corrected.

The circumstances which gave birth to the great post-war explosion in educational exchange are different today than they were then. Our allies stand in a different relationship to us—and we to them—and many nations of the Third World are taking second and third looks at the world around them and, in particular, their relationships with the industrialized nations.

For a long time we, our old allies and our new friends stood in a relationship grounded on the post-war realities of reconstruction, development and a bi-polar great power structure.

The situation is now different.

The present generation in Europe has no memory of America as the benign victor. Its views of America are fundamentally different.

Competing power centers have made more complex the relationship between the superpowers.

Our enthusiasm for rapid development has been tempered by time and experience.

The successes—and the setbacks—of the past 35 years have changed inevitably the environment within which international exchange must operate. Many of the structures and much of the rationale which underlay the first great steps in international exchange are in place and remain valid.

But we are faced with a situation where, while all logic points to the necessity of increased contacts, over time we have seen those contacts, particularly between our young people and our academic populations, decline.

Some of this decline is natural and flows from such factors as increased academic infrastructure, the demands of expanding economies, academic time frames, and career pressures and even the fluctuations on currency markets.

Some of the decline can be traced to an unfortunate trend which sees our young people turning inward, losing that interest and curiosity about other countries, other cultures which characterized earlier student populations.

And much of the decline can be ascribed to sheer ignorance where we here in the United States must carry a full share of the blame. During a period when the number of countries participating in the Fulbright Program increased from 27 to 120, the budget for these exchanges, judged in constant dollars, declined more than 57 percent. It is only in the last 2 years that we have been able to reverse that trend.

And against this background, we have all seen the recent studies—many of you have probably contributed to their preparation.

—Most of our undergraduates can complete their studies without acquiring a foreign language.

—Only 1 in 20 of our undergraduates today enrolls in a course considering foreign peoples or cultures.

—One in five high schools has no foreign language instruction, less than 3 percent of our high school graduates have meaningful foreign language competence.

—Our television devotes less than 2 percent of its programing to international topics.

I know I speak to the converted—and the concerned.

At least in part, we view international exchange as providing some remedies, particularly at the teen-aged level.

You—as we in USIA—have for long dedicated ourselves to the proposition that international exchanges must continue and increase if perceptions between peoples are to be true and undistorted.

You—as we—are convinced that the potential for misunderstanding must be reduced and that the potential for disaster if it is not is great.

You—as we—view increased distances between our younger generations with alarm.

And you—as we—see the potential for great achievement on all fronts enhanced through the cooperation which international exchange affords.

What are we doing to breathe new life into this vital element of our international well-being?

First, let me emphasize that what we do we must do together. To a certain extent we at USIA have a responsibility to sound the alarm and to help in the diagnosis.

USIA's institutional structure and expertise and our embassies overseas have been enlisted in the effort.

We have a responsibility to negotiate with foreign governments. And I can say that in my travels overseas a consensus has been quickly reached that we must do all that is possible to increase our contacts.

I might say that I just returned from a trip to Egypt, Israel, and India. The leaders of those countries—and I think particularly President Mubarak and Prime Minister Gandhi—are keenly interested in expanding exchanges—particularly youth exchanges—with the United States. These world leaders recognize, as President Reagan does, the important role exchanges can play for the future well-being of our nations and peoples.

I have been encouraged in these talks, particularly those with our key allies. They are in agreement that governments must do what is necessary to help revitalize structures.

If I may single out one example as illustrative, the Federal Republic of Germany has joined with us in a broad-ranging effort to increase the levels of exchanges between our two countries. I am particularly pleased to welcome Ambassador Lahn from Germany, whose presence here testifies to the importance his government places on these programs.

But it is our educational institutions and our exchange organizations—and, in a larger sense, our people—who must join together with us if the challenge is to be met.

Our role, as I see it, is catalytic.

Through a variety of means, we are prepared to join with the private sector in our efforts:

—In the Fulbright Program, long the keystone of our academic exchange efforts, special efforts will be made to increase American participation. If all goes well with our budget, we hope to double the number of grants for American graduate students and researchers going abroad.

—An overall increase of almost 50 percent in all Fulbright categories from 1981 to 1983 has been achieved;

—The Hubert H. Humphrey Fellowship program will expand opportunities for foreign officials to spend an academic year in the United States;

—The University to University Affiliation program will continue to be strengthened. This year 29 new affiliations have been initiated; —Overseas research centers will increase in number and scope;

—We are studying the challenge posed by the presence in the United States of hundreds of thousands of foreign students, who come on their own funds but are forced to discover America unaided;

—We have increased the number of short-term, high-level visitors to this country by one-third. Some 44 current foreign heads of state and 495 cabinet-level officials around the world have participated in this program. In all, over 3,200 alumni of the international visitor program hold prestigious positions in government, media, and other fields.

Other, promising new directions will be described during this conference.

I come now to the initiative with which this conference is primarily concerned: The President's International Youth Exchange Initiative. As you know, the President has given this initiative his personal attention. His interest in it is high.

He said in a letter to Prime Minister Nakasone of Japan: I know that you and I share the belief that the experiences of our young people indeed shape our future world. I was moved when you were here in January by your description of the experience which your own daughter had as an exchange student in the United States.

That is what our initiative is all about—the turning of nations into individuals.

We have attempted to develop this initiative taking into account at all stages the elements which we see as crucial in responding to the challenges of our current exchange environment:

—We are obtaining funding through a mix of public funding and private fund-raising.

—An active President's council is advising on the program and is engaged in fund-raising. It has set for itself an ambitious goal of $10 million—and is well along to meeting that with $3.8 million in pledges already from U.S. corporations.

—We are working exclusively through private, not-for-profit exchange organizations.

—We are seeking—through a just-launched public service advertising campaign developed with the Advertising Council—to raise the level of exchange consciousness throughout the United States—encouraging potential exchangees and host families to come forward. The value of the air time and print space for this campaign is worth conservatively $30 million. This is unprecedented in the exchange field. Several companies—here Westinghouse comes to mind—have imaginatively brought the initiative to the attention of their personnel.

—We are, for the first time on this scale, looking at a teen-aged population. If I may, for a moment, expand on this—the "flickering spark," to which President Reagan referred in his first announcement of the initiative, [11] is one which may be ignited at any time in a person's life. We are convinced that our purposes are best served if as broad and complete a spectrum of our young people as possible can be included in exchange activities. Surely a case can be made for doing this as early in the learning cycle as possible. Therefore, our emphasis on youth.

—We are working closely together with partner governments in this initiative, developing bilateral programs whose aim it is to bring the possibilities of an exchange experience to as many diverse groups as possible, including young workers, young professionals—young people not necessarily on the so-called academic track.

—As needed and when possible, we are encouraging in-depth orientation and language study prior to departure.

—We are encouraging longer stays with as much home-stay experience as possible.

—We are working closely with American communities to encourage networking and sharing of resources, infrastructure and experience.

There will be other opportunities during this conference for all of you to become better acquainted with this initiative.

D. International Communications Policy

Document 135

Statement by the Coordinator for International Telecommunications and Information Policy-Designate, Department of State (Dougan), Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, February 22, 1983 [1]

Role of the Coordinator for Telecommunications and Information Policy; U.S. Participation in International Telecommunications Conferences

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. As luck would have it, I think my stamina will hold out a little longer than my voice. But if you will, bear with me.

[1] Source: Oversight of the UNISPACE and International Telecommunications Union Conference: Hearing Before the Subcommittee on International Operations of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1984), pp. 16–20.

I would like to, of course, thank you all for inviting me to appear before the subcommittee today and as you mentioned earlier, I am going to be focusing more on the future rather than the past. I think Ambassadors Gardner and Beggs in the written testimony make some very instructive and informative comments. [2] I would also like to take a moment to add my own compliments to Ambassador Gardner for the effective dedicated work he did as a member of the private sector in the public interest, as chairman of our delegation.

I am now going to focus on the future, however, and among other things, the creation of the Office of the Coordinator.

I think it is particularly appropriate that I have been asked by this committee to bring you up to date on the establishment of the Office of the Coordinator, because as you pointed out, you have been very instrumental in advocating that it be created. And I might add personally that I am very honored that both the administration and the Department of State have asked me to take on this very vital responsibility.

As you know, the Office of Coordinator was created to provide a long overdue focal point for international communication and information policy, not only within the Department of State, but within the whole Federal community.

In past administrations, telecommunication issues have been treated generally as only incidental factors in other, presumably more overriding, policy issues. This must change. As other nations have come to recognize telecommunications-related policies as a lynchpin of economic, political, and national security interests, so must we. The Reagan administration recognizes this and is taking action to meet more effectively the new economic and technological challenges. The administration's initiative in setting up the Office of Coordinator for International Communications and Information Policy is a vital step.

There is undoubtedly no single or correct organizational answer to how the U.S. Government can deal most effectively with these issues. Telecommunications is decidedly complex, difficult to understand, and subject to rapid technological, economic, and policy impacts. There are many players and many interests which have major roles in our international communication and information policy. Rearranging or creating new bureaucratic boxes which deal with these issues is only part of the answer. But by establishing a single and identifiable office within the executive branch to coordinate the policy formulation and implementation activities of the disparate Federal agencies who have direct interest, we have indeed taken a positive and significant step. This view is also shared by the private sector, as this subcommittee well knows. U.S. business interests have long been frustrated by not being able to identify a specific office, much less department, to deal with their concerns abroad. Telecommunications is particularly bedeviling on this score because, more often than not, U.S. business must deal directly with foreign governments rather than business counterparts abroad.

As someone from the private sector who has been in telecommunications for 17 years, I very much share the concerns of the private sector in dealing with these issues. And as coordinator, I plan to substantially increase the utilization of appropriate private sector expertise and perspective in policy formulation.

As Executive Secretary of the Senior Interagency Group on International Communication and Information Policy, I have already established a working relationship with the 14 Federal agencies who have primary interests in these areas. In addition, I am instituting more frequent and regularized information sharing and consultation at the operational as well as policy levels.

Another key area is the Federal Communications Commission. As an independent regulatory body, the Commission is not subject to executive branch veto. As the Commission's decisions and activities have increasingly farflung impacts on U.S. policies abroad, it is essential that there be

For testimony by James M. Beggs, Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and head of the U.S. delegation to the Second U.N. effective coordination and consultation between us. Thus, I am particularly pleased by the outstanding support and cooperation I have already received from Chairman Fowler and his staff.

It has already proven to be extremely helpful in the few weeks I have been informally on board. And speaking of formally, the office will, in fact, be launched within the next few weeks.

The initial staff will be lean and purposely unbureaucratic. As you can see, I am not standing on a lot of ceremony at this point because there is an awful lot to be done.

With the committee and resources of the Department of State and the increased attention of senior policy people throughout the Government, I am optimistic.

I would like to add the very considerable interest and attention that Under Secretary Schneider has given to this issue has been both invaluable from a personal standpoint, but also in setting up the office. I think we are very fortunate to have someone who on a personal basis has such an interest.

I would now like to turn to the specific issues related to today's hearings—international telecommunications conferences. Although this is just one of the many areas in which the Coordinator's Office has lead responsibilities, it is exceedingly important.

Unlike many conference arenas, international conferences in telecommunications do more than consult or posture. Most international telecommunications policies are de facto decided under the auspices of international organizations such as the ITU. International telecommunications law may be painted as a landscape of gray, but the proliferation of resolutions, declarations, conventions, recommendations, and even opinions from these plenipotentiary meetings is creating a sharply outlined and regulated world. These international proceedings in turn affect or effect domestic U.S. telecommunications laws and policy. Little wonder we take them so seriously.

The Mobile Services World Administrative Radio Conference (WARC) will begin next Monday, February 22, 1983, in Geneva and is scheduled to last 3 weeks. Its scope is highly technical and operational and limited to specific urgent matters relating to the mobile services. Even with that premise, we are operating on a basis that we must plan for political contingencies. So we have taken particular care to brief this delegation, notwithstanding the presumed benign technical aspects of it. We have done extensive briefings for them on the political as well as the technical aspects of the conference.

I have given particular attention to identifying and establishing a broad-based Washington home team. I think this is where your question of continuity comes in. Not only am I setting this up, and it is probably perceived as a little bit of overkill on my part in having such an extensive home team for this particular conference, but I think we are fortunate in that it can be almost like a dress rehearsal for some of the conferences coming up. The home team for this one, I think, can start building that continuity for future deliberations because the technical interest and focus of conferences are not always the same, so it is not necessarily advisable to always have the same people involved in deliberations. But some of the ancillary issues are, in fact, the same. And this is where the continuity factor is particularly important.

The home team members will include members of the Senior Inter-Agency Group as well as staff level experts on the technical, political, and administrative issues. As I mentioned earlier, I am using this as a base for the Region 2 home team, and, in fact, I probably will be naming that within the next 3 or 4 weeks, even though it is 5 or 6 months ahead of time. But I want to bring them on board in the process as quickly as possible, so that even though they happen to be on the home team, they should know as much as the people we have over in the trenches.

The next conference is the Region 2 Broadcasting Satellite Conference which takes place June 13 to July 15 in Geneva. [3]

[3] Ambassador Abbott Washburn, Chairman of the U.S. delegation to the 1983 Regional Administrative Radio Conference Direct Broadcasting Satellite Service, reviewed U.S. participation in the conference in testimony before a subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. See International Communication and Information Policy: Hearings Before the Subcommittee on Arms Control, Oceans, International Operations and Environment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Ninety-eighth Congress, First Session (Washington, 1983), pp. 154–164.

Its basic agenda is to carry out the planning of the broadcasting satellite services in the 12 GHZ band. We generally refer to it in the United States as DBX, Direct Broadcasting Satellite. The other two regions have already had their planning conferences and, in fact, have set some bad precedents in terms of a priori planning. So this conference is of particular importance to us, to say nothing of the fact that it represents a potential industry projected to exceed $5 billion over the next several years for U.S. interests alone.

I would say the watchword of this conference and others should be "flexibility." The future cannot be well served by the rigidity and brittleness of a priori planning.

It is clear that we and many other countries want to avoid the adoption of an unrealistic plan, much less an inflexible one, such as the one that was adopted in 1977. We want to see more flexible forms of agreement. We also want to have flexibility in procedures to meet new requirements not foreseen at the time of the conference and allow for necessary modifications to those plans to address changing technical, operational, and economic realities.

Substantial preparations have already been underway for these conferences. The FCC, through its notice of inquiry processes, its public advisory committees, and internal staff efforts, has been the focal point for many of the technical preparations for this conference.

In fact, Abbott Washburn as chairman of our delegation, was nominated almost a year ahead of time. So we have had some lead-time in terms of the conference delegation chairman. He has not been caught in the same time bind that Ambassador Gardner was.

We also have a recommended delegation list of about 31 people who have, in fact, been working on a steering committee basis with Commissioner Washburn since mid-November.

Internationally, the Department has already coordinated an extensive program of consultation with foreign countries, including preparation for the ITU conference preparatory meeting, the CITEL of the OAS and others.

Further consultations on a multi- and bilateral basis are also planned.

The High Frequency WARC Conference is something you are going to be hearing a lot more about. Literally, the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, and Radio Liberty are going to be on the spectrum chopping block in this particular conference. It will be very important to our public diplomacy initiatives. That will be held January 18, 1984. It will be held in two sessions.

The second session will be to carry out the plans; that will be in October of 1986. The January 1984 one is the adoption of the technical standards and the planning principles and methods.

What you are seeing here is that conferences build on one another. I concur with your point about continuity. None of these conferences really act in isolation; decisions or priorities that are set or precedents that are set in one conference become very difficult to undo in future conferences.

I would say as an aside, one of the other things that I think is very important in our whole planning process is not just continuity, but contingency planning in general, planning for the future including the interrelationship of conferences. This is one of the patterns that I hope to be able to establish.

I know time is running short, so I will abbreviate the rest of my testimony.

The High Frequency Conference has been in a preparatory stage for several years. In the technical area, an IRAC committee has been dealing with this since 1980. And there are a number of international forums as well as interagency groups that have been involved in this.

We are going to be having a number of bilateral negotiations. I already chaired one earlier this month with the Canadians. We expect to formally name a chairman of the H.F. delegation within the next few weeks. Our candidate, I might add, is a member of the private sector and a very distinguished one at that.

The Space WARC Conference will be in mid-1985, and again mid-1988. The agenda will be developed at the ITU administrative counsel meeting this May.

So again you are building these processes very early on and way in advance.

I have touched on preparations themes in general. Criticisms that have been made of the past are valid. But I think that we have to focus on what we are going to do now, where we are going from here, rather than looking back. The forums, the whole arena of international conferences is going to be increasingly complex, increasingly contentious, so that no amount of planning is going to make life easier for us. But that is certainly an area that I intend to devote considerable time to.

I would like to add a couple of fine points, however. That is, in planning for these conferences, we cannot just focus on the last year of preparation after the delegation has been officially formed. It is the years preceding that mold the preparations. We must continuously look ahead if we are to protect our future.

The other, and I think equally important, factor is that we just can never take for granted our relationships with these international organizations. As Ambassador Gardner pointed out, we came within 4 votes of leaving the ITU. If these forums are taken over by composers of political anthems rather than the architects of technical agreements, we must reexamine our role and participation. In other words, we must be continually vigilant, and work not only through the systems we have, but look to alternative systems and nurture those as well.

At a minimum, we must pursue contingency planning, including more effective use of bilateral and multilateral consultations. This does not necessarily mean we leave the ITU, but we cannot even consider scenarios of how we deal with alternatives without, first, making the best of the forums that already exist including the ITU, but make no mistake our overriding commitment is to the interest of the United States, and we must nurture whatever forums that best meet those interests.

Thank you.

Remarks by President Reagan, June 23, 1983 [4]

World Communications Year 1983

MR. ELLINGHAUS. Good morning, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Bill Ellinghaus, is this you?

MR. ELLINGHAUS. This is I.

THE PRESIDENT.—Listen, I'm very pleased to have been invited by you to be a part of the U.S. Council meeting for World Communications Year, [5] since I know that this gathering is the focal point for a number of important announcements.

The American Communications Industry has repeatedly demonstrated our nation's technological and entrepreneurial leadership. And I'm very pleased to note that the spirit of private enterprise that's made our world leadership possible has at the same time demonstrated our national concern that world communications innovations should represent a force for economic prosperity and goodwill.

In fact, something of that technology is apparent in this very call because I know you're utilizing a satellite but also I'm calling you from Air Force One someplace out here between Washington and Chicago.

I understand that the announcements of U.S. investments in World Communications Year projects range from large to the small and from the technical complexity of IBM's Caribbean Inter-Island Disaster Warning System to the simplicity of international educational exchange.

President Reagan spoke to William Ellinghaus, Chairman of the U.S. Council for World Communications, by telephone from aboard Air Force One, en route from Washington to Chicago, Illinois. The conversation began at 10 a.m. EDT.

And while we don't want to lose sight of the importance of the educational exchange and technical assistance investments, I'm pleased to see the extraordinary possibilities of the new technologies represented in the New York Teleport. The Teleport project represents the best kind of public/private partnership with the Port Authority of New York, the city of New York, the States of New York and New Jersey, Merrill Lynch and Western Union—have all joined in creating a facility that will establish a communications gateway and permit vast, new communications possibilities.

And I'm pleased to see that with the efforts of Roger Birk, the Chairman of Merrill Lynch, Mayor Koch, the Port Authority of New York—all of you are to be commended for what you're doing. At this Council meeting of the World Communications Year, we should all be pleased that you've managed to combine your concern for world communications needs and for the nations and peoples who've historically been less fortunate with this introduction of another great American achievement.

So, God bless you all and thank you for letting me participate by this long-distance method.

MR. ELLINGHAUS. Mr. President, on behalf of the World Communications Year '83 Council, I want to thank you for your very, very encouraging words and certainly for demonstrating in a most effective way how communications do, in fact, bring us very close together.

It's a great send-off for our meeting here at the White House. So, we thank you again, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Have a good meeting.

MR. ELLINGHAUS. Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. You bet. Goodbye.

MR. ELLINGHAUS. Goodbye, sir.

Statement by the Head of the U.S. Delegation to the Conference of the International Program for the Development of Communication (Dougan), Tashkent, Soviet Union, September 5, 1983 [6]

International Communications Assistance

We are here today to discuss important communications issues, and I wish to begin by noting that this meeting is being held under the cloud of a tragic event which is a source of great concern to all of us here. It reaffirms with bitter irony the vital necessity of communications among nations.

The governments of many countries have already issued formal statements of outrage and protest of the shooting down by the Soviet Union of the unarmed Korean Air Lines passenger plane with the loss of 269 lives. I want to clearly and forcefully reiterate the grave concern of my government and the people of the United States.

We can neither understand nor excuse this terrible act. The distrust, uncertainty, and fear which such wanton actions introduce into the international atmosphere increase the difficulty of developing understanding between nations and are, in themselves, obstacles to the improvement of international cooperation in every field. I believe in a very sad way this incident highlights the extreme importance of clear and honest communications among nations.

I am here for some very simple and straightforward reasons. My government, at the highest level, believes in the importance of international communications assistance. Furthermore, we are encouraged that the International Program for the Development of Communication can be an effective and important arena for forwarding the goals of international communications assistance.

My colleagues and I have come to Tashkent for this fourth IPDC meeting to reaffirm yet more strongly our commitment as a government to communications development in other countries. Possibly even more significant, we bring to you a strong commitment from our private sector. The creativity and expertise wiiich rests in the private sector—the nongovernment part of the United States—is the very core of our society and the driving force for whatever we as a nation have been able to accomplish in our brief 200 years of existence. Particularly in the area of communications, it is not government entities which have researched and created the technology which has contributed so dramatically to the advent of satellite, telephone, and computer technology of this so-called telecommunications revolution. It has been in large measure the creativity of individuals and small, as well as large, private companies. During the past year in the United States, we have worked hard, both in government and industry, to focus our country's attention on the need for the developing world to participate more fully in the benefits of communications.

The expanded development of communications technology, training, and service is already doing much to bring us closer and closer to a global communications capability. Increased efficiency and lower cost of telecommunication hardware and software are trampling the barriers to access by even the most remote parts of the globe. But we must focus constructively on these new opportunities, not on the old barriers, if nations are to benefit from this growing technological resource.

In our view the IPDC is earning a vital role in this process. I commend the pragmatic and nonpolemical approach of the IPDC during these early years of its existence. The IPDC council has made progress toward the goal of providing constructive and practical assistance through IPDC projects. This has not been easy. The economies of most nations, including my own, have only just begun to emerge from severe economic recession.

Resources continue to be scarce. Furthermore, people throughout the world still have very limited awareness of the key role of communications technology in development. Those who recognize the need for increased communications capabilities are still unsure how to apply limited economic resources to fill the need. Given these factors, Dr. Amunugama [IPDC Director] [7] and the IPDC Secretariat deserve special credit for demonstrating that the IPDC has a unique and important contribution to make.

In the United States, we have also made considerable progress this past year in nurturing increased government and private sector interest and support for communications development. At previous meetings, the U.S. Government committed $550,000 for the support of IPDC projects. Today, I am pleased to announce that our contribution [over 3 years] will be almost double that—$850,000 in 1984. Funds can be converted to other currencies as needed; $350,000 will be used as funds in trust. Another $500,000 will be used to support IPDC projects consistent with the overall objectives of the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID). Of this amount, $300,000 will be used as matching funds to contribute to projects supported by other donors. Because we believe so strongly in sustaining and building the momentum underway, we are prepared, subject to congressional approval of funds, to continue this matching fund arrangement in 1985 and 1986.

Even more significant than our government commitment is the increased interest of the U.S. private sector. For example, the U.S. Council for World Communications Year, a private sector organization representing 109 corporations, associations, and universities, has undertaken the responsibility for coordinating nongovernment support for IPDC projects. It has already created one foundation to support the IPDC approved project with the Arthur Clarke Center for Modern Technologies in Colombo, Sri Lanka. We see this as the beginning of a productive new partnership in my country between the private sector and the IPDC. It is an encouragement to all potential donors to look increasingly to their private sector for additional support for IPDC projects.

The United States is a large and diverse country with many groups playing an active role in communications development assistance over and above support channeled through the IPDC. In fact, the great majority of U.S. assistance to date, from both government and the private sector, continues through channels established long before the IPDC was created. For instance, AID in 1982, through its traditional assistance programs, obligated more than $91 million to projects around the world that are helping countries develop and use their communications infrastructures. These programs include the application of radio, satellite, and other telecommunications technologies in support of economic development, agricultural growth, health care, and education. Many of these are pilot projects opening new paths, stimulating new ideas, and increasing the communications capabilities of countries in Asia, Latin America, Africa, and the Near East.

The U.S. Information Agency (USIA) is conducting an increasing number of academic and professional exchanges in the communications field. These programs are bringing government, telecommunications, and media leaders from developing countries into direct and extensive contact with their American counterparts. This not only provides assistance from the United States to developing countries but increased understanding in my own country of the communications needs and approaches of the Third World. Over 100 countries have been recipients of communications assistance-related projects through AID and USIA.

This does not begin to include projects supported by other parts of the U.S. Government and the private sector of joint government-private sector initiatives such as the United States Telecommunications Training Institute, which was announced last year at the plenipotentiary meeting of the International Telecommunication Union (ITU) in Nairobi. In this program, the U.S. telecommunications industry is offering free training, of the highest professional caliber, to Third World specialists. The institute has now completed its summer semester courses in which 106 professionals and technicians from 54 countries have participated. At the moment, a course in satellite communications for development is being provided to another 25 developing country professionals. Before the year is over, it expects to reach its initial goal of providing training for over 300 Third World technicians.

IBM Corporation, in partnership with the Governments of Antigua and Bermuda, has established a prototype computerized storm warning system for the Caribbean, scheduled for completion in 1985. This system's early warning will be invaluable in helping protect lives and property which are caught up in more than 100 dangerous tropical storms that occur annually in the Caribbean. GTE Corporation is donating ultra-high-frequency radio and multiplex equipment for a communications link between Mozambique and Zimbabwe. In addition to providing a vital communications link between Mutare and Beira, it will provide a major addition to the Pan Africa Telecommunications Network.

Many other private corporations and organizations—such as the American Society of Newspaper Editors, The World Press Freedom Committee, and a number of American universities—are actively engaged in programs to bring the latest expertise in communications to other nations. There are many, many more examples, too numerous to cite here, of what is taking place between the United States and developing countries in this area. We will make available through the UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization a folder of reference documents outlining in more detail examples of the myriad of U.S. Government and nongovernment projects in progress. Increasingly, these public and private activities can be coordinated with or conducted through the IPDC.

As the IPDC can increase its ability to provide an organized, practical, and nonideological clearinghouse for communications assistance projects, it will be able to take on a proportionately more important function in this area. The IPDC must continue to develop a track record of financing effective and practical projects that enhance the values of free and expanding communication. I believe there are additional steps which we should consider in this context, for example, followup and evaluation of the success and problems of IPDC projects, increased documentation, and publicity of the "success stories" of the IPDC.

I would also like to say that in the IPDC the principle of consensus has worked well for us all. Obviously, different views exist on priorities and the urgency of different projects. But council members to date have, for the most part, approached these differences with the vision required to assure that each one's needs are understood and accommodated through consensus. Since there is more than enough for us to do upon which we can readily agree, it would be a disservice to the countries we seek to assist to jeopardize the consensus principle.

Much has been done, and there is much to be done. We continue to be encouraged and committed to expanding the communications horizon for all of us. The cultural integrity, richness, and diversity of every country has always depended on its ability to communicate.

Whether it is the writing on tombs in Tashkent that harken back to its 2,000 years of civilization or the highspeed data transmission of this conference's documents, civilization is only remembered by its ability to communicate.

Letter From the Secretary of State (Shultz) to the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee (Percy), September 21, 1983 [8]

U.S. Objectives and Activities in the International Information and Communication Field

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In your letter of June 22, 1983, [9] you raised a number of important questions concerning policies of the United States in the field of international communication and information. This area is of growing importance to our national security, our competitiveness in world markets, our political relations with other countries, and our foreign policy in general. I welcome the interest and attention of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and share your concern that improper or inadequate management of the issues involved could raise significant problems for the United States.

International communication and information policy is a broad policy field. It includes areas such as press freedom and free flow of information among nations, international trade, foreign direct investment, distribution and use of the natural resources of communications (frequency spectrum and satellite orbital positions), technical standards, intellectual property rights, high technology research and development, public diplomacy, monetary policy, and a host of other concerns which are major components of foreign policy. Clearly, in this area the policies that we as a nation formulate and implement in the international arena are critical to the national interest.

Our basic objectives in this area are: to promote an environment in which ideas and information can flow more freely among nations, to support the advancement of international commerce through the efficient and innovative use of communications resources, and to expand information access and communications capabilities of developing countries. The first objective is fundamental to the advancement of democratic institutions throughout the world; the second reflects the strategic contribution communications and computers make to the expansion of opportunities for worldwide trade and investment; the third recognizes communications as an important catalyst for growth in developing countries. These objectives can be most effectively achieved by relying whenever possible on free enterprise, competition, and free trade, with a minimum of direct government involvement or regulation.

We vigorously pursue competitive, deregulatory policies domestically, and they will continue to serve as the foundation for our policy internationally. However, it is essential in pursuing our international objectives to realize that the United States has adopted policies quite different than most other nations where state-run monopolies provide the bulk of telecommunications services. There are difficulties in extending our domestic communication and information policies into the international arena. Seeking acceptance of our policies by other governments can best be accomplished by example and through consultation and negotiation. I intend to pursue actively these objectives by working to improve existing international organizations (including the International Telecommunication Union, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, and the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade) and through bilateral consultations with other nations. We have in the past few months initiated comprehensive talks on a wide range of communications issues with the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany, and preparations for similar consultations with other countries are in progress.

Formulation and implementation of policy in this area require active participation by a number of federal agencies. No single agency possesses the resources or expertise necessary to advance effectively the interests of the United States in this area. Further, serious harm could be done to our interests by uncoordinated decisions or pronouncements by the agencies involved. Recognizing this, we have established the Office of the Coordinator for International Communication and Information Policy to provide a needed senior-level focal point for U.S. Government policy in this area. We are actively seeking the cooperation and support of other agencies.

Initially, some of the projects we have undertaken and planned through the leadership of the Coordinator's Office and in cooperation with other agencies include:

The initiation of bilateral consultations with other governments on a broad range of international communications and information issues.

A review of international organizations that handle issues in communications and information with a view to assessing how the interests of the United States can be most effectively advanced through these and alternative forums.

The development of a computerized data bank to enable us better to coordinate interagency formulation, implementation and oversight in the field of international communication and information period.

A systematic upgrading of reporting and information exchange between Washington and our embassies abroad and the possible designation of special attachés for communication and information in key countries.

An assessment of communication and development assistance including the identification of what the United States is providing through various programs not typically labeled "assistance for communication development" but which in fact provide such assistance.

The improvement of our preparations for international telecommunication conferences by more advanced interagency planning of strategies and positions and further refinement of the "Home Team" concept which we recently instituted to provide more sophisticated and continuing support from Washington for our delegations abroad.

The refinement of policies involving intellectual property rights including just compensation for the creators of information and programing in the context of our commitment to the free flow of information.

The review and formulation of recommendations on our international satellite policies in light of technical and economic changes and of recent applications to the Federal Communications Commission by private companies proposing alternative systems.

An assessment of the structure and effectiveness of public advisory bodies and mechanisms to facilitate the vital exchange of information between government and private interests and to utilize better private sector expertise in policy formulation.

This list is far from exhaustive, but I believe it will give you an indication of the scope and the seriousness with which we are approaching our major responsibilities in this crucial policy area. Significant progress on this ambitious agenda requires strong support, cooperation and commitment of resources from all the federal agencies involved. I am impressed with the progress to date.

I look forward to an ongoing exchange of views on all of these issues and will keep you fully informed of our activities and progress in the coming months. The Department stands ready to participate in the hearings planned by the Foreign Relations Committee. Answers to your specific questions are enclosed. [10]

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ

Letter From President Reagan to the People of Europe, January 28, 1983 [1]

An Invitation To Negotiate an Intermediate-Range Missile Ban

American and Soviet officials have just resumed negotiations aimed at reaching an agreement to control intermediate-range nuclear weapons. We have proposed and will continue to urge the Soviets to agree to ban altogether both their intermediate-range land-based nuclear missile weapons and those we intend to deploy in response to their buildup. The Soviet insistence on maintaining a nuclear threat to America's allies while denying them the corresponding means to deter that threat remains the principal obstacle.

A way must be found to overcome this obstacle. Just as our allies can count on the United States to defend Europe at all cost, you can count on us to spare no effort to reach a fair and meaningful agreement that will reduce the Soviet nuclear threat.

In this spirit, I have asked Vice President Bush, in the city where East meets West, [2] to propose to Soviet General Secretary Andropov that he and I meet wherever and whenever he wants in order to sign an agreement banning U.S. and Soviet intermediate-range land-based nuclear missile weapons from the face of the Earth.

I make this offer out of a conviction that such an agreement would serve the interests of both sides and, most importantly, that the people of Europe want nothing more. I urge Mr. Andropov to accept it.

Address by Vice President Bush, West Berlin, January 31, 1983 [3]

Peace and Security in Europe

I passed through Germany some months ago on my way to a funeral in Moscow, but this is my first time in Berlin. That fact alone surprises me, because Berlin has long been in my consciousness, as it has been in the consciousness of all Americans. Twenty years ago, in a square now called John F. Kennedy Platz, an American president gave a speech which is still well remembered. In his speech he said of those who do not understand the great issues between the free world and the Communist world: "Lass' sie nach Berlin kommen." ("Let them come to Berlin.")

I am glad that this speech should come in the first day of my European trip. No other city in Europe could offer a more compelling setting for this discussion tonight. For Berlin is unique, an island of democracy in a threatening sea. It has survived violent storms. Throughout, the character and unbreakable courage of its citizens have inspired lovers of freedom all over the world.

He returned to the United States on February 10. All ellipses in this document are in the source text.

For nearly four decades now, the people of the Federal Republic of Germany and her allies have worked together, with diligence and with passion, to see that Berlin survived as a free city. I spoke a moment ago of the American consciousness of Berlin. Those of us who were alive in 1948 and 1949 recall vividly the struggle for Berlin. The memories of Berliners who lived through that period still evoke feelings that bind us to each other.

I am thinking of the Berlin worker who said, "Early in the morning, when we woke up, the first thing we did was to listen to see whether the noise of aircraft engines could be heard. That gave us the certainty that we were not alone, that the whole civilized world took part in the fight for Berlin's freedom."

I am thinking, too, of another sanguine Berliner who reflected after it was all over: "God knows, even the best blockade is no bargain. But if there must be a blockade, then it's better to be blockaded by the Soviets and fed by the Americans. Just imagine if it were the other way around!"

The German and American peoples have a long and spirited relationship. Nearly 20 percent of the American people trace their origins to this country. This year will mark the 300th anniversary of the first German immigrants to America. I don't expect you to be impressed by that. Three hundred years is not such a long time to inhabitants of a city that is almost 750 years old; but for us it is a very long time indeed.

Tomorrow morning I shall visit the Berlin Wall, a monument to a great evil. I will only be visiting it; but you must live with it and with all that it does to the German people. That monstrous wall helps us all to reflect on what we have achieved and on how we achieved it. The alliance on the other side of the wall is based on domination; ours is based on cooperation. And it is in that spirit that I have come to Europe. I have come in the pursuit of peace. During the next 10 days I will be meeting with many European leaders. And if my visit to Europe encourages public debate, I welcome it. NATO is strong enough to sustain the most spirited public debate. We do not shrink from dialogue, because for the Western democracies, diversity has always been our source of strength.

And so I have come to Germany with neither a lecture, nor threats. You have been subjected to both of these in recent weeks from those who have accepted your hospitality; and, as you say, "Genug ist genug." ("Enough is enough.") When he arrived in Berlin 20 years ago, President Kennedy said, ". . . those who live nearest the adversary, those who keep the watch at the gate, are always prouder, more courageous, more alive, than those who live far to the rear." He who presumes to instruct Berliners presumes a great deal indeed.

Those of us who live in the rear—if any territory in this nuclear age can truly be called the rear—can learn by standing in the shadow of the wall. Equally compelling is the principle upon which our alliance is based. It is there, for friend and foe to see, in the North Atlantic Treaty, Article 5—an attack on one of them shall be considered an attack on all.

NATO's strategy has no more important goal than that of making this principle credible. If our linkage to each other is credible, we can ensure deterrence. We can insure our freedom. And we can insure peace.

But the Soviet Union's unprecedented arms buildup of the last 15 years has threatened to undermine the credibility of NATO's deterrent. And the Soviets have attempted to break the linkage between European and U.S. security so essential to Article 5. The Soviet buildup has been relentless and thorough, conventional and nuclear. There is no disagreement on that score. And one of its most dangerous new elements has been its monopoly on intermediate-range nuclear missiles which can strike Europe. I am speaking of weapons which could reach this room in a few minutes.

If the Soviet Union eventually succeeded in breaking that linkage—if it could separate the United States and our armed forces from the defense of our allies in Europe—our deterrence would be undermined, and with it the peace we have all maintained for nearly four decades. And that is precisely why in December of 1979, the nations of NATO—all the nations of NATO—made a two-part decision: first, to deploy in Europe NATO weapons capable of deterring an attack by Soviet SS-20s and other intermediate-range nuclear forces (INF). The second part of the decision was to enter into negotiations with the Soviet Union in order to reduce the level of these weapons on both sides. [4]

(As a footnote to December of 1979, it is worth remembering that was also the month the Soviet Union sent tens of thousands of its troops into Afghanistan, where over 100,000 of them remain today.)

NATO's decision was the result of exhaustive consultation. As a consequence, it was the right decision. It was the right decision then; and it is the right decision now.

It has also become a controversial decision. It has become controversial in part because of certain myths that have gained currency. Under the light of reasoning, these myths vanish, because they are shadows without substance.

The first myth is that the deployment of these intermediate nuclear forces would change NATO's strategy. Untrue. The exact opposite is the case: The INF decision is, in fact, essential in order to maintain the strategy that has always been a bedrock of NATO—maintaining linkage between the United States and its allies that insures deterrence.

The second myth is that this decision was somehow thrust on an unwilling Europe by the United States. Anyone who so much as reads newspapers knows this is absurd. The NATO decision was a response to widespread concern, especially in Europe, over the alarming buildup of Soviet INF forces.

Third, we are asked to believe that the INF deployments would increase the alliance's reliance on nuclear weapons. But, in fact, we decided at the same time to withdraw 1,000 nuclear warheads from Europe. That withdrawal has been completed. Thus, even after deploying the INF forces, there would still be fewer allied nuclear warheads in Europe than there were in 1979.

The fourth, and last, myth is that these INF deployments would be a step toward nuclear war-fighting and to war-fighting confined to Europe alone. But NATO's policy has always been one of peace and deterrence, which depends on balance, not imbalance. As to the notion that the United States desires to confine conflict to Europe alone, well, I find this proposal bitterly ironic. I can do no better than to quote from a European publication, The Economist of London, from a cover article entitled: "Can So Many Young People Be Wrong About the Bomb? Yes, They Can." The article said: "Nothing more justifiably infuriates the Americans than the allegation that they want to put cruise missiles and Pershing II missiles into Europe in order to have a purely European nuclear war. These missiles were originally proposed—by Europeans—for exactly the opposite reason." The Economist is right. Nothing infuriates the President and me more than the suggestion we are preparing to fight a nuclear war, because we are not preparing to fight a nuclear war. We are preparing to deter war.

It is the very presence of American forces that provides a guarantee of U.S. involvement in any attack on Western Europe. And that goes a long way toward guaranteeing that the Soviets will not be encouraged to launch an attack. There are in Europe about 350,000 American military personnel, who, as part of the NATO security forces, provide, in President Reagan's words, the "living" guarantee of our commitment to the peace and security of Europe. Our security is indivisible from Europe's security. An attack on you is an attack on us.

From time to time I am asked what I think of the antinuclear peace demonstrators. I confess I am sometimes tempted to say, "Which ones do you mean? The ones here or the ones in the Lubyanka?" Well, my answer is this: I have great warmth for anyone who is for peace. It so happens we, too, are for peace. I also have the greatest warmth for anyone who is against nuclear war. It so happens we, too, are against nuclear war.

The NATO countries have fought and paid the price for the framework of freedoms within which those antinuclear groups march and demonstrate and speak their minds. Is there any among us who is not proud that these voices can find their fullest expression in our countries? Is there any among us who would not welcome, or even thrill to, the sight of anti-nuclear demonstrations in Red Square? Is there any West German who was not saddened to witness the swift and ruthless suppression of a similar movement on the other side of the wall? Franz Kafka, were he alive, might have been grimly amused by the fact that the Eastern regime even outlawed the very symbol of their movement: a Soviet statue of a man beating a sword into a ploughshare.

There have been other movements in the Warsaw Pact countries. And we remember them well. We remember East Germany in 1953. We remember Hungary in 1956. We remember Czechoslovakia in 1968. And today our thoughts are of Poland. Outside of Europe, the world has seen over 100 armed conflicts and wars since NATO came into being. Joseph Luns, our alliance's Secretary General, said, memorably: "NATO is the real peace movement."

We are always—and especially now—looking for new ways to preserve what we have won over the last four decades. That is why both elements of NATO's decision on INF are inseparable and mutually reinforcing. By that I mean just this: If we are to be credible in our arms negotiations, the alliance must be united in its determination to deploy the INF systems if necessary. Why? Because otherwise the Soviet Union will simply have no incentive at all to negotiate seriously. None whatsoever.

When he came into office, President Reagan reviewed the INF decision and endorsed it. Then, in November 1981, he announced a proposal. The United States, he said, would seek the complete elimination of these most destabilizing and threatening weapons—the land-based intermediate nuclear missiles. [5]

The Soviet Union, in the meantime, responded with a thundering "Nyet," followed by a tremendous public offensive designed to drive a wedge between the United States and its European allies. As part of that offensive, Mr. Gromyko, the foreign minister of the Soviet Union, traveled to Germany recently. He spent a good deal of his time declaring that the United States is, as usual, trying to plunge the world into nuclear holocaust. I followed Mr. Gromyko's statements very closely, and I was left wondering whether he reminded Germans of the German proverb: "Wenn der Fuchs predigt, schau auf deine Gaense." ("When the fox preaches, look to your geese.")

The Soviets have made proposals of their own. They said that the zero-option proposal was unacceptable. Then they said that even an interim-basing agreement would be unacceptable. One concludes that what the Soviets do find acceptable is its own monopoly of nuclear weapons aimed at the heart of Europe. Having said that, I think I can safely predict that the Soviet Union will announce tomorrow that it finds me unacceptable.

For his part, President Reagan has said that the United States will consider any and all reasonable Soviet offers at the negotiating table in Geneva. That is what we are doing right now. Ambassador Paul Nitze [head of the U.S. delegation to the INF negotiations in Geneva] is meeting now with his Soviet counterpart to negotiate a treaty that will maintain NATO's security and preserve the peace.

The United States is a member of a defensive alliance. And it takes pride in having tried, since 1945, to bring about arms control through negotiations with the Soviet Union. The very first proposal for international control of atomic bombs was proposed by President Truman at the United Nations. The Baruch Plan, as it was named, called for the "creation of an international Atomic Energy Development Authority" to which all aspects of the development and use of atomic energy would have been entrusted. [6] The Baruch Plan, which called for on-site inspection of nuclear facilities, was rejected by the Soviet Union—at a time when the United States was the only nation possessing atomic weapons.

Then, in 1955, President Eisenhower called for an "open skies" policy. [7] He proposed that the United States and the Soviet Union immediately exchange blueprints of their military establishments and begin aerial reconnaissance in order to prevent surprise attack and begin a comprehensive and effective inspection and disarmament system. This, too, was rejected by the Soviet Union.

Other American presidents made some progress, however limited. President Kennedy put forward the atmospheric test ban treaty; and President Nixon was able to negotiate the anti-ballistic missile treaty and SALT I. [8] But these did not stop the proliferation of increasingly sophisticated nuclear weapons.

During the past 37 years, we have been dealing with determined adversaries, who know their objective and who have moved methodically to achieve it. Their objective—not ours, but theirs—is clear military force superiority over the United States and our European allies, intended to break the security linkage that has made the NATO alliance so effective.

Yet, in spite of this, the United States has pursued a policy of unilateral nuclear restraint for more than a decade. As I mentioned earlier, in 1981 alone, the United States withdrew 1,000 nuclear warheads from Western Europe. I know of no comparable, uncompensated nuclear reduction by the Soviet Union in the entire postwar period. As a matter of fact, since the mid-1960s, the United States has reduced its nuclear arsenal worldwide by some 8,000 warheads.

During the last decade, the United States did not deploy any new ICBMs, or any new ballistic-missile submarines, or any new bombers. But over the same period of time, the Soviet Union deployed an entire new generation of land-based strategic missiles, including three multiple-warhead, land-based systems, as well as three new submarine systems and a new bomber. In so many words, the United States has maintained a self-imposed, decade-long, de facto freeze during the time the Soviet Union pursued a vigorous military buildup.

On November 2, 1977, Chairman Brezhnev said: "We do not want to upset the approximate equilibrium at present . . . between East and West and Central Europe, or between the U.S.S.R. and the United States." At that time the Soviet Union had about a dozen SS–20s.

But it was that old fox Lenin who said, "Facts are stubborn things." Since Mr. Brezhnev made that statement, Soviet SS–20s have been sprouting like fields of asparagus, more than 300 in all. These could not have been put there to redress some supposed military imbalance created by the West, because NATO has no comparable weapons. Indeed, the first comparable NATO weapons will only be available for deployment at the end of the year, more than 6 years after the SS–20s first appeared.

This is why it is very difficult to believe that the Soviet Union's motives are, as it says, purely defensive. Berliners know better than most what it takes to wrest an acceptable agreement from the Soviet Union. NATO's deployments are in the headlines today, but a decade ago the headlines were about the negotiations over the very status of Berlin itself. The Soviet Union had mounted a public offensive to divide the allies then, as they have today. But the West, by negotiating in good faith, by being creative and flexible, and by remaining true to the principles which have brought us so far, was able to secure an agreement which preserved Berlin's vital interests.

The United States views its presence in Berlin as an absolutely sacred trust. Our military forces stand ready to defend the Western sectors from any threat. We are totally dedicated to the Quadripartite Agreement, [9] and we will continue to expect strict observance and full implementation of all its provisions in all sectors of Berlin, East and West. We also support fully the ties between Berlin and the Federal Republic of Germany, because they provide the vital foundation for the economic prosperity and for the democracy of the Western sectors.

So one asks: Is it being intransigent to follow the same path today in our negotiations with the Soviet Union that we followed a decade ago? Or prudent?

We know that many in Europe and the United States are anxious for a rapid agreement—for a breakthrough in our arms negotiations in Geneva. Permit me, if you will, a personal note. I work very closely with President Reagan. And you can take me at my word when I say that no one is more anxious than he for a just agreement. And no one is more determined than he to achieve one.

Now permit me to ask this: Should we, in our eagerness for a rapid agreement—for any agreement, as it were—lose sight of our basic objectives, bearing in mind these are no less than security and peace? Such a question answers itself. No, we must not let our eagerness for rapid negotiating progress cause us to lose sight of or compromise our basic objectives—objectives vital to achieving an agreement which provides for the security of Europe.

First, we must reduce the nuclear threat to Europe to the lowest possible level. We would fail miserably in our responsibilities to ourselves and to our children if we merely legitimized the already awesome levels of nuclear firepower directed by the Soviets against Europe. We would fail, too, if we accepted a somewhat lower but still unimaginably destructive Soviet monopoly. And that is why we proposed the complete abolition of intermediate-range nuclear missiles. Because that is how to reduce the nuclear threat to the lowest possible level.

Second, we must bring about a balanced agreement. It cannot be acceptable to the West to concede a permanent monopoly of nuclear missiles to the Soviets without allowing NATO to deploy comparable systems to deter the threat they represent.

Third, a sound agreement must preclude artful circumvention. It is not enough merely to permit the Soviets to withdraw mobile missiles behind some artificial line, only so they can re-cross the line on short notice. Nor is it enough to give the Soviets credit for offering to eliminate some obsolete and unreliable missiles—military antiques, really. Let us all agree that we need more effective measures than that if we are to reduce the nuclear threat to Europe.

Fourth, we need an agreement which can be verified. Even with sophisticated intelligence capabilities, it is very difficult to keep track of mobile missiles. The fact is, it is easier to detect some missiles when there are supposed to be none, than it is to detect, say 60 missiles when there are supposed to be 50. That is a crucial point. All the more so when you cannot rely on your negotiating partner to be fully forthcoming in your attempts to verify the size of his arsenal.

I have spoken tonight at some length. The complexity of the issues before us is sometimes overwhelming. The number of missiles, the number of launchers, the number of warheads, their throw-weight, proposal, counterproposal, counter-counter-proposal—these facts and numbers have, I think, obscured a much more central and much more compelling realization, because we are united by needs that supersede mathematics.

It is hard to avoid the details. But if numbers are to inform our consciousness and our reasoning, should we not consider, above all, 38? We all know what that represents: The amount of years we have lived in the peace and security that we together made possible by binding ourselves to each other. Thirty-eight years—the longest, uninterrupted peace this continent has known this century. Then our real mathematical reckoning and our most demanding task becomes: How do we diminish the deadly numbers, while seeing to it that those four decades increase?

Economics and Security in East-West Relations

In the 6 months since I took the oath of my present office, one of the real pleasures has been coming to know and to work with members of the German Government. You have some very able and very fine people serving you. I must admit that I am biased by the fact that we tend to think alike. By that, I do not mean that we always agree. I mean that our disagreements lead to constructive and friendly discussions that shed light, not heat, and result at least in understanding one another and usually in a reduction of the degree of disagreement. So, as I say, I am genuinely pleased to be with you.

I want to talk with you about a subject which goes to the heart of relations between the United States and Germany, indeed, the heart of relations between the United States and Europe. I want to talk about the West's commercial and financial relations with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. This is an area where there is agreement between us on basic principles but not on applications of those principles.

There are two distinct points of view on East-West trade. The first, I will call the "trade" viewpoint. It emphasizes the lucrative market in the East for Western goods. Most goods that the Soviets want to buy are available from a number of sources, are not sensitive, and are not "high technology" items with military applications. Those who hold this view favor almost unrestricted trade with the East.

The second viewpoint, which I will call the "security," stresses the fact that the Soviets seek to use Western goods and technology to further their military, strategic, and economic goals to the detriment of Western interests. This view emphasizes that the Soviet economy and its political-military apparatus are an integrated whole. In the most extreme form, it argues that any Soviet economic gains can readily be transformed into strategic benefits. The group that takes this position naturally favors severe limits on East-West trade.

I have described these two viewpoints in extreme terms. Scarcely anyone holds either view as starkly as I have expressed it. The question for Western policymakers, both American and European, is where to go between these two extremes. No one wants a total cessation of trade; no one advocates selling advanced military hardware to the U.S.S.R. My impression is that Europeans have generally been closer to the first, or "trade," viewpoint, whereas Americans, especially in this Administration, are closer to the "security" view.

President Reagan made his concerns on these issues clear at the Ottawa economic summit in 1981. He urged that the alliance take a hard look at the policies which had governed economic relations with the Soviet Union since the late 1960's. He asked whether the expected moderation of Soviet behavior had occurred. He encouraged his colleagues to study the problems of vulnerability to interruptions by the Soviets of supplies on which the West might become dependent. After discussing the issue, the leaders at Ottawa adopted a historic statement on this question: "We . . . reviewed the significance of East-West economic relations for our political and security interests," the leaders said at Ottawa. "We recognized that there is a complex balance of political and economic interests and risks in these relations. We concluded that consultations and, where appropriate, coordination are necessary to ensure that, in the field of East-West relations, our economic policies continue to be compatible with our political and security objectives." [11]

In response to similar concerns, the alliance leaders made the following statement at the Versailles summit the following year:

> "We agree to pursue a prudent and diversified economic approach to the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe, consistent with our political and security interests. This includes actions in three key areas. First, . . . our representatives will work together to improve the international system for controlling exports of strategic goods to these countries and national arrangements for the enforcement of security controls. Second, we will exchange information in the OECD on all aspects of our economic, commercial and financial relations with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Third, taking into account existing economic and financial considerations, we have agreed to handle cautiously financial relations with the U.S.S.R. and other Eastern European countries in such a way as to ensure that they are conducted on a sound economic basis, including also the need for commercial prudence in limiting export credits. The development of economic and financial relations will be subject to periodic ex-post review." [18]

The Reagan Administration supports trade between the West and the communist nations—as between any nations—where that trade is conducted at prevailing market prices and terms, where there is a mutual balance of advantages, and where the specific transaction—or category of transactions—does not contribute directly to the strategic advantage of the Soviets. Western consumers and producers, both agricultural and industrial, can benefit from such trade. The President stated last November 13 that we favor mutually beneficial trade and that it is not our policy to engage in economic warfare with the Soviet bloc. [19]

At the same time, it is clear that the Administration has profound concerns about the security implications of East-West trade as we have seen it develop over the last decade. Let me try to explain our concerns.

The Soviets have used their trade with the West to improve productivity and avoid bottlenecks in their stagnant economy. A major reason for their poor economic performance and their consequent need for Western equipment is their diversion of resources to a huge military buildup—equivalent to about 14 percent of their gross national product. This level of armament is far beyond any level that might reasonably be needed for defensive purposes. It can only be viewed as an ominous threat to the rest of the world, especially the free societies and democratic governments. It imposes huge costs on the Western countries to protect themselves.

In a few instances, the Soviets have even used Western manufacturing equipment to produce military goods. The Kama River plant built by Americans made trucks that now are in Afghanistan with Soviet troops. The Bryant ball-bearing grinders have improved the accuracy of Soviet missiles beyond what they could have attained with other grinders. By acquiring Western technology the Soviets have been able to produce greater quantities of weapons than would have been possible with their own technology.

Soviet purchases of high technology equipment for extracting and transmitting energy will increase their production and exports of oil and gas in the late 1980's and 1990's. This has two unfortunate consequences.

First, it involves increased risk to Western consumers that the Soviets could interrupt supply as a political instrument. Even if overall energy dependence on the Soviets seems not to be excessive, specific regions or industries may be quite vulnerable since the immediate availability of reserve stocks or substitute fuels is small.

Second, it provides significant additional Soviet hard currency earnings to the Soviet Union, thus contributing to their ability to engage in expensive overseas adventures. As a result, we tend to view Western sales to the Soviets of energy-related equipment—equipment that for the most part they cannot produce for themselves—as seriously detrimental to Western security.

As a consequence of these and similar concerns, President Reagan has laid down a number of principles to govern our trade with the East.

We will not provide subsidies or preferential treatment to the Soviets beyond that which we would provide to any nation on an ordinary commercial basis. We believe that we should not subsidize Soviet pursuit of goals that are inimical to Western interests.

We will not sell any equipment or information to the Soviets that they can divert to military uses, or that they can use to support military uses. If we did provide such goods, we would be trading away, at one stroke, the West's most important strategic advantage—its superior technology and productive efficiency.

As I stated earlier, we do not believe it is wise to provide the Soviets with technologically advanced oil and gas extraction equipment, the use of which would increase their foreign exchange resources and allow them to expand their overseas adventures.

[18] The quotation is from paragraph 3 of the final communiqué of the Versailles Economic Summit Conference, June 6, 1982; for text, see ibid., 1982, p. 308. Ellipsis is in the source text.

[19] For text of President Reagan's radio address to the Nation announcing the removal of economic sanctions against the Soviet Union, November 13, 1982, see ibid., p. 446.

We will, however, continue to sell the Soviets goods that cannot be used for military or strategic purposes; such sales reduce the foreign exchange that they have available for other uses.

We will endeavor to avoid, and we will urge our friends to avoid, situations where we are overly dependent on the Soviets to supply a critical resource.

Western security is not uniquely a U.S. concern. It must rally the entire alliance. While there has long been a consensus that the West should avoid transferring equipment of direct military relevance, only recently have Europeans begun to think about East-West economic relations in a broad strategic context. As you no doubt know, the seven summit countries are currently engaged in a major effort to convert the agreements at Ottawa and Versailles—which I quoted a moment ago—into concrete policies. These efforts, which took on new life on November 13 when the pipeline sanctions were lifted, include:

A study within NATO that will highlight the security implications of East-West trade and develop a stronger overall rationale for distinguishing between trade which the Soviets might exploit to the detriment of our security and trade that has no significant strategic implications.

An effort within the OECD to monitor more closely the magnitude of East-West credit and trade and to identify major imbalances resulting from trade between market and nonmarket economies. Also in the OECD, we are working within the Arrangement on Export Credits to bring export credit practices closer to market terms for trade among all developed countries, including the U.S.S.R.

In conjunction with the OECD, the International Energy Agency will study Western requirements for energy, and attempt to identify major vulnerabilities in Western supplies of energy and means of reducing these vulnerabilities.

In COCOM—the informal group that oversees strategic trade controls—we want to enhance Western security by initiating multilateral controls on other high technology equipment, including oil and gas equipment not now under control. At the same time, we are joining with our COCOM allies to harmonize and strengthen the mechanisms that we use to enforce COCOM controls, as was agreed in January 1982.

We recognize that we all have important trading relations with the East and that those are perhaps more deeply established in Europe than in the United States. We also understand the particular geopolitical circumstances involved in much of this trade. We believe, however, that the joint studies now going on will produce a strong rationale for assuring that such trade is at least as much to our advantage as to the Soviets'.

We are not looking for a formal treaty. The first phase of the process now underway will provide the information necessary for each participating nation, acting on the basis of its own national judgments and decisions, to weigh the security implications of trade and draw the conclusions it considers appropriate.

Allow me to recall for a moment a painful period in U.S.-European relations that is relevant to the issue at hand. In December 1981, President Reagan reacted to Soviet adventurism in Poland. Among other actions, he restricted exports of certain U.S.-made equipment for the production and transmission of oil and gas. [14] In June, he widened the restrictions to foreign subsidiaries and licensees. [15] European suppliers of equipment for the Yamal pipeline were caught up in those restrictions. U.S. companies also were seriously affected and lost substantial business.

We do not want—we did not want in June 1982 and do not want now—the friction, tension, and bickering associated with those export restrictions. But we do want a consensus within the alliance that economic relations must "be compatible with our political and security interests." The President lifted the export controls because he believed that such a consensus had been hammered out and that it would lead to concrete policy actions. The efforts in NATO, OECD, COCOM, and in national capitals must, in our view, head in that direction.

To conclude, I want to cite a few statistics.

The United States spent $183 billion (outlays) on defense in FY 1982 (6.6 percent of gross domestic product—GDP); we are spending nearly $1.4 trillion over the next 5 years (FY 1983–87).

We estimate that Germany spent about $23.1 billion on defense in 1982 or about 3.4 percent of its GDP. [16]

We estimate that Japan spent about $11 billion on defense in 1982 or about 0.9 percent of its GDP.[16]

This money is not being spent to defend ourselves from each other or, as Herb Stein has pointed out, from the Sioux Indians. It is being spent because we see what the Soviet Union is spending, what it is building, and what it is doing, at home and around the world.

Our question is: To what extent are our economic relations with the Soviet Union forcing us to spend even more on defense? The results are not all in, but we are going to urge a careful evaluation when they are.

Statement by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Burt) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, March 7, 1983 [17]

East–West Issues and the European Allies

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for those opening remarks again. It gave me an opportunity to catch my breath. I apologize for being late. As you pointed out, I do have an opening statement which I will submit for the record.[18] It deals with a range of issues that you have just touched on, including the status of current European integration efforts, what we are doing with the allies to bolster conventional defenses, and some of the current United States-European Community trade issues about which I know there is a great deal of interest.

What I will concentrate on in my brief remarks today is really three separate issues: One, the state of play of our efforts within the alliance to work out a common set of policies concerning East-West trade; second, the state of play in our current discussion and dialog with the allies on the question of the December 1979 INF decision; and lastly, I will make a few remarks on the new Soviet leadership and prospects for United States-Soviet relations.

On the question of East–West economic relations, we believe that we have set into place over the last several months a high-level dialog between the members of the Alliance on East-West economic relations—you remember that dialog was initiated following the pipeline controversy—which has been successful.

You will recall there was an informal meeting of allied foreign ministers at La Sapinière in Canada last fall,[19] and that did provide impetus for resolving the pipeline dispute itself, and establishing a process for reaching a consensus on the main element of East–West economic relations.

In his visit to Europe last December, Secretary Shultz built on that consensus, and did achieve agreement on a program of studies which will help us give concrete expression to a Western policy on economic relations with the East over the longer term. Right now those studies are underway in various fora. We have a study in NATO looking at the security implications of East–West trade on the NATO alliance. We have studies concerning financial flows and energy dependence underway in the OECD and within Cocom, the so-called coordinating committee.

The alliance countries and Japan are examining technology transfers. We will continue to pursue these studies, and they will be the topic of discussion in a group of high-level meetings that are coming up this spring. The first is the OECD ministerial in May. In May we also have the Williamsburg summit of the industrialized countries, and in June we have a NATO foreign ministers meeting in Paris, and we expect East–West economic issues and the status of those studies to be addressed at all three meetings.

Moving to INF, and the status of the 1979 decision, I think the first point to make was the success of the Vice President's mission to Europe last month. The Vice President presented our assessment of the negotiations and listened carefully to what our allies had to say. The result was virtually complete accord on what we are trying to achieve in the negotiations in Geneva, and what is necessary for an acceptable agreement for the United States and the alliance as a whole.

I think equally important, the Vice President was able to dispel a number of myths about the alliance's December 1979 decision, which have confused publics in Europe and, I might add, the United States.

Despite the success of the Vice President's mission as well as the election outcome yesterday in Germany, the debate over INF is clearly not over. People in Europe are concerned about nuclear weapons issues, as they rightly should be. No other issue is more important. The President has, I think, made very clear the concern, the commitment he has to making progress on arms control.

We and our allies continue to be in full agreement about our proposal for eliminating an entire class of longer range land-based INF missiles in Europe and, I might add, worldwide. We are negotiating in good faith, and as we have said many times, ours is not a take-it-or-leave-it proposal. Our proposal as well as our negotiating position in Geneva, and Paul Nitze's instructions to listen to serious counterproposals, are based on four principles, and I think it is worth listing those principles very quickly.

First, is that we can only reach a fair agreement on the basis of equality between the United States and the Soviet Union.

Second, is a corollary. British and French strategic systems are by definition not part of those bilateral negotiations, and we will not take them into account in these negotiations.

Third, Soviet proposals which have the effect of shifting the threat from Europe to Asia cannot be considered reasonable, and I might add here that Secretary Shultz heard a great deal in his recent visit to Asia from Asian friends and allies about their concerns about any INF agreement that redistributed the Soviet SS–20 threat to Asia.

Fourth, as in all areas of arms control, it will be essential that any INF agreement be verifiable.

While we continue the negotiations, we will make, I think, a much better effort to inform our publics, both in the United States and in Europe, about INF issues, and we will continue the really unique pattern of consultations that we have had underway with the allies prior to the December 1979 decisions, and after that decision.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, on East–West relations, I think it is timely now to say a few words about the status of our relations with the Soviet Union, and what we know about the Soviet Union, now that it is in the midst of its first leadership transition in 18 years. Yuri Andropov has inherited from his predecessor a mixed legacy of impressive gains in foreign and domestic policy, and a host of pressing problems.

During the Brezhnev period, the Soviet Union did emerge as a global military power, and on the domestic scene, unprecedented stability was maintained within Soviet society and the ranks of the Communist Party.

At the same time, Yuriy Andropov has inherited some difficult policy dilemmas. The unprecedented military buildup and Soviet geopolitical expansionism has generated a strong, if belated, American response, and has ultimately raised the risk for the Soviet Union of empirical overextension in places like Afghanistan.

The domestic stability of the Brezhnev era ultimately degenerated into immobility as the application of consensus became increasingly inadequate to deal with the mounting economic problems and the deepseated malaise of Soviet society.

Thus, by the time of Brezhnev's death, the new Soviet leadership faced a set of mutually reinforcing foreign and domestic problems as severe as that confronted by any Soviet leadership since the death of Stalin.

Internationally, détente with the United States, which was the centerpiece of Brezhnev's policy, has collapsed, and at home Yuri Andropov faces a number of serious structural economic problems. It is too early to make any definitive judgment about the Andropov policy so far. I would only say that continuity seems to be the watchword for both domestic and foreign policy, but, I might say, a more energetic practice of continuity.

Mr. Andropov has instituted a series of far-reaching reforms, not structurally but anticorruption drives, in a number of sectors of Soviet society, designed to improve efficiency. He has begun to move people around within the Soviet bureaucracy, but our Soviet experts to date have not seen any pattern or any indication that this is going to lead to any fundamental change in the organization of the Soviet economy or the organization of the Soviet political apparatus.

In terms of foreign policy, we see a more energetic application of the Soviet peace offensive in Europe, in an effort to derail the December 1979 decision. We see the beginning of talks with the Chinese as well as more diplomatic activism in South Asia.

But, again, we see no indications to date that the Soviet practice of neoimperialism, as an assertive Soviet foreign policy backed up mainly by the growth of military power, is in any way going to be changed or evolved, at least in the near future.

I will stop there, Mr. Chairman, and be happy to take your questions.

Statement by President Reagan, March 30, 1983 [20]

Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Negotiations

Thank you very much. Last week, when I addressed the American people on this administration's defense program, I expressed our determination to reduce our reliance on the terrible power of nuclear weapons to assure the peace.

And today I want to say a few words about this critical aspect of our security policy—our efforts to drastically reduce the arsenals which burden the lives of our own citizens, of our friends and allies, and, yes, of our adversaries as well.

As you know, over the last year and a half, this administration has undertaken a comprehensive and far-reaching arms control program designed to achieve deep reductions in nuclear arms, to rid the world of chemical weapons, and to cut the size of conventional forces in Europe. I'll be saying more about these initiatives in a speech tomorrow. [21] But this morning let me focus on one of these negotiations.

I have just met with the Ambassadors of the countries of the North Atlantic Alliance. We invited them here because the citizens of their countries share with Americans a profound hope for success in the Geneva negotiations on intermediate-range nuclear missiles.

The forces being discussed in the INF negotiations directly affect the security of our allies. As I told you last week, the Soviet Union has deployed hundreds of powerful, new SS–20 missiles, armed with multiple warheads and capable of striking the cities and defense installations of our allies in Europe, and of our friends and allies in Asia as well. The Soviets have built up these forces even though there's been no comparable threat from NATO. They've deployed them without let-up—there now are more than 350 SS–20 missiles, with more than 1,000 nuclear warheads. NATO will begin deploying a specific deterrent to this threat late this year, unless, as we hope, an agreement to eliminate such weapons would make this deployment unnecessary.

The United States, with the full support of our allies, has been negotiating in Geneva for more than a year to persuade the Soviet Union that it is a far better course for both of us to agree to eliminate totally this entire category of weapons. Such an agreement would be fair and far-reaching. It would enhance the security of the Soviet Union as well as the security of NATO. And it would fulfill the aspiration of people throughout Europe and Asia for an end to the threat posed by these missiles.

So far, the Soviet Union has resisted this proposal and has failed to come up with a serious alternative. They insist on preserving their present monopoly on these weapons. Under their latest proposal, the Soviets would retain almost 500 warheads on their SS–20 missiles in Europe alone and hundreds more in the Far East, while we would continue to have zero. Their proposal would actually leave them with more SS–20 missiles than they had when the talks began in 1981. In addition, the Soviets have launched a propaganda campaign aimed apparently at dividing America from our allies and our allies from each other.

From the opening of these negotiations nearly 18 months ago, I have repeatedly urged the Soviets to respond to our zero-zero proposal with a proposal of their own. I've also repeated our willingness to consider any serious alternative proposal.

Their failure to make such a proposal is a source of deep disappointment to all of us who have wished that these weapons might be eliminated or at least significantly reduced. But I do not intend to let this shadow that has been cast over the Geneva negotiations further darken our search for peace.

When it comes to intermediate nuclear missiles in Europe, it would be better to have none than to have some. But if there must be some, it is better to have few than to have many.

If the Soviets will not now agree to the total elimination of these weapons, I hope that they will at least join us in an interim agreement that would substantially reduce these forces to equal levels on both sides.

To this end, Ambassador Paul Nitze has informed his Soviet counterpart that we are prepared to negotiate an interim agreement in which the United States would substantially reduce its planned deployment of Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles, provided the Soviet Union reduce the number of its warheads on longer-range INF missiles to an equal level on a global basis.

Ambassador Nitze has explained that the United States views this proposal as a serious initial step toward the total elimination of this class of weapons. And he has conveyed my hope that the Soviet Union will join us in this view. Our proposal for the entire elimination of these systems remains on the table.

We've suggested that the negotiations resume several weeks earlier than originally planned. The Soviets have agreed to that and talks will resume on May 17th.

I hope this initiative will lead to an early agreement. We remain ready to explore any serious Soviet suggestions that meet the fundamental concerns which we have expressed.

I invited the NATO Ambassadors here today not only to review these developments, but to express my appreciation for the firm support which the allies have given to our negotiating effort in Geneva. And I can assure them of my personal commitment to the closest possible consultations with them on the INF.

This consultative process has already proven one of the most intensive and productive in the history of the North Atlantic Alliance. It has made the initiative announced today an Alliance initiative in the best sense of that term. And over the past months, we and our allies have consulted intensively on the INF negotiations.

I have been in frequent and close contact with other Heads of Government. Vice President Bush had a very productive discussion with allied leaders on INF during his trip to Europe. Secretaries Shultz and Weinberger have exchanged views with their counterparts from allied governments. And the NATO Special Consultative Group has met regularly to review the negotiations and consider criteria which should form the basis for the Alliance position in INF.

The very thoughtful views expressed by the allies in these consultations have been of significant help in shaping this new initiative. This process is a model for how an alliance of free and democratic nations can and must work together on critical issues. It is the source of our unity, and gives us a strength that no one can hope to match. And it gives me great confidence in the eventual success of our efforts in Geneva to create a safer—safer world for all the Earth's people.

Thank you very much. (Applause)

Fact Sheet Issued by the White House, March 30, 1983 [22]

New Proposal for an Interim Arms Agreement

Today, the President announced that the United States has put forward in Geneva a new proposal for an interim agreement under which the United States would substantially reduce its planned deployment of Pershing II and ground-launched cruise missiles provided the Soviet Union reduc 4 the number of its weapons on longer-range INF missiles to an equal level on a global basis. The United States views this proposal as a serious initial step toward the total elimination of this class of weapons, and hopes that the Soviet Union will join us in this view.

In December 1979, the NATO countries agreed on a two-track approach to Intermediate-range Nuclear Force (INF) issues. In response to the increasing Soviet INF threat, especially the deployment of new Soviet SS-20 missiles, the allies agreed to deploy 108 Pershing II ballistic missiles and 464 ground-launched cruise missiles (GLCM's) in Europe. At the same time, the allies also called for arms control efforts to limit these and comparable Soviet INF missile systems.

On November 18, 1981, following alliance consultations, President Reagan made a farreaching proposal as the basis for the U.S. position at the INF negotiations which began on November 30, 1981. This proposal called for the total elimination of the entire class of US and Soviet land-based, longer-range INF missiles, in other words zero missiles of this type on either side. The United States continues to believe that this would be the best and most moral outcome to the negotiations. Security would be enhanced for both East and West.

Unfortunately, the Soviet approach to the negotiations has been very different. They have so far been adamant in their refusal to give serious consideration to our "zero-zero" proposal, or to come up with any acceptable alternative. The Soviet position in the negotiations would preserve their present monopoly of these weapons. Under their latest proposal, the Soviets would retain 486 warheads on 162 SS-20's retained in Europe alone, while the United States would have zero missiles. Hundreds of warheads on Soviet SS-20s in the Far East would be completely unconstrained.

The NATO assessment of the current Soviet position in Geneva is reflected in the NATO Defense Ministers' communiqué issued on March 23 following their most recent meeting in Portugal:

"The Soviet proposals have not substantially changed since the beginning of the negotiations. In fact, their most recent proposal would leave the Soviet Union with more SS-20 missiles than they had when the negotiations began, deny NATO the right to modernize its means of deterring this threat, allow them to have an unlimited number of mobile SS-20's east of the Urals which still pose a threat to NATO Europe and almost totally eliminate from the European continent United States aircraft which are indispensable to NATO's conventional defences. The result would be to preserve the Soviet monopoly in the field of land-based LRINF missiles, to erode seriously the linkage between the United States' strategic deterrent and the defense of NATO Europe and to [22] Source: Office of the Press Secretary to the President. The fact sheet was released to the press at 10 a.m. on March 30, 1983.

further the Soviet long-term aim of dividing the Alliance." [23]

The new U.S. proposal was made after extensive consultations with our NATO allies and discussions with other friends including Japan. It was offered on March 29, at the concluding session of the negotiating round. In presenting this proposal, the United States asked the Soviet Union to give it careful consideration during the recess between rounds and suggested that the delegations resume negotiations several weeks earlier than previously envisaged. The Soviets have agreed to resumption on May 17.

The new U.S. proposal meets the criteria for an agreement laid down by the President:

—equality of rights and limits between the United States and the U.S.S.R.;

—no compensation for third country forces;

—global ceilings;

—no adverse impact on NATO's conventional defense capability; and —effective measures for verification.

In continued discussions of this proposal, the United States will continue to be as flexible as possible in searching for agreement at Geneva within the criteria identified above.

The United States views the new proposal as an interim step toward the total elimination of U.S. and Soviet land-based, longer-range INF missile systems. If an interim agreement is reached, the United States considers that negotiations should continue with the goal of achieving the total elimination of such systems. While offering this new initiative, the current U.S. proposal to eliminate the entire class of land-based, longer-range INF missiles remains on the table in Geneva. The United States remains convinced that zero missiles on both sides would be the best outcome of these negotiations.

Address by the Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs (Burt) Before the "Time" Conference on the Atlantic Alliance, Hamburg, April 25, 1983 [24]

Critical Juncture for the Atlantic Alliance

This conference could not be more timely. And the need to view trans-Atlantic developments with care could not be more critical. As a former journalist, I am aware that those outside government have the opportunity to observe the ebb and flow of current affairs with a unique perspective. As a government official, I am also aware that this opportunity is not always seized as often as it might be. It is for this reason that Time and the conference organizers deserve our most sincere thanks and appreciation. Indeed, those of us enmeshed in the day-to-day of policymaking are in need of the criticism and vision of people such as yourselves and gatherings such as this. Without the benefit of perspective, we are less likely to shape historical forces than to be shaped by them.

I believe we have arrived at a critical juncture in the annals of the Atlantic alliance. Let me hasten to add that this is not because we are in a deep crisis as some would have us believe. Rather, we are in the midst of what can best be described as a grand debate. It is a debate over the very essence of the Atlantic alliance—its purpose, its shape, its future.

This is hardly the first time the alliance has been in the throes of self-examination and self-criticism. Indeed, the Atlantic alliance was born amidst controversy. The entire notion of peacetime engagement in the affairs of Europe went against the grain of American history. Postwar America was anxious to bring its boys back home and bring about a parochial peace with prosperity.

Nor were the formative years of the alliance easy ones for Europeans. Reconstruction and recovery were foremost in everyone's mind. Arming to prevent yet another war demanded all too scarce resources; forging bonds of trust with recent foes demanded the intellectual courage to look ahead rather than back.

But on both sides of the ocean, the uncommon men of the immediate post-war era made difficult, and sometimes unpopular, decisions. In the United States, two world wars had shown all too clearly the folly of isolationism. It was understood that Jefferson's famous injunction against "entangling alliances" did not have permanent application. In Europe it was understood that the security of the Continent against the emerging Soviet threat required permanent association with a noncontinental power. Out of these twin recognitions the alliance came to life. The initial debate had been decided.

The alliance of the 1950's was an alliance overwhelmingly dominated by the United States. Deterrence depended on U.S. nuclear superiority to offset a Red Army which never demobilized. Decisions were largely reached in Washington and communicated through NATO in Paris. For the most part, we spoke, Europe listened; we led, Europe followed.

By the 1960's it was increasingly evident that such a formula had grown obsolete. Europe was no longer prostrate. Economic recovery had succeeded. The alliance was no longer based on a simple security guarantee but had evolved into a true military coalition with integrated national forces. And Europeans were less and less willing to accept American leadership without question. The conditions for a second great debate had materialized.

Many of the strains accompanying these developments were manifested in the nuclear realm. Then, as today, nuclear politics went to the heart of the alliance. Two principal issues emerged in the nuclear debate of the 1960's. The problem was in part military. The American guarantee was no longer as convincing, given Soviet strides in developing their nuclear arsenal. How could the U.S. strategic deterrent compensate for conventional weakness and deter Soviet strategic forces simultaneously? Equally, the problem was political. Europeans wanted some say in the life-and-death decisions affecting nuclear weapons.

Washington's proposed approach for dealing with these problems—the NATO multilateral nuclear force—only exacerbated these tensions. Fortunately, the ultimate solution had the opposite effect. The doctrine of flexible response, formally adopted by the alliance in 1967,[25] provided for a continuum of forces—conventional, theater nuclear, and strategic nuclear—by which deterrence could be maintained at all levels. And a new institution, the NATO Nuclear Planning Group, was created.[26] Responsibility for nuclear policymaking would henceforth be shared. The basic Atlantic bond was maintained.

But in the best tradition of Hegelian logic, yesterday's synthesis has given way to today's antithesis. There is no little irony in this. In the 1960's, European concerns reflected a perceived lack of U.S. commitment to maintain the American nuclear guarantee; in the 1980's, the most vocal elements in Europe view with alarm American efforts to ensure the credibility of this same nuclear guarantee.

Thus, in 1983, we are once more hearing from many quarters that the alliance is no longer relevant, or viable, or both; that only radical surgery can prolong the patient's life. If I read the signs correctly, a third grand debate is underway. The reasons for this happening now are several.

First, the passage of time has dulled the initial Atlantic impulse; the alliance no longer seems as relevant to the concerns of young people bearing outlooks formed by experiences far from those of the post-war era.

Second, European states and institutions have advanced in capacity, wealth, and independence. Many on both sides of the Atlantic view the alliance as an anachronism, a product of an era of American strength and European weakness which no longer exists.

Third, U.S. and European interests are not always identical or even complementary. We are often economic competitors. We often have differing views of Third World or regional crises. We at times have

---

[25] The North Atlantic Council, meeting in Brussels at the ministerial level, December 12-14, 1967, adopted a strategic concept "based upon a flexible and balanced range of appropriate responses, conventional and nuclear, to all levels of aggression or threats of aggression."

[26] The NATO Nuclear Planning Group was established by the North Atlantic Council, meeting in Paris at the ministerial level, December 15-16, 1966.

contrasting assessments of the Soviet Union, the threat it poses, and how best to manage East-West relations.

Fourth, a prolonged period of economic recession has increased competition for budgetary allocations. Providing more for defense and deciding how much each member of the alliance ought to provide are increasingly contentious.

Finally, shifts in the military balance and the emergence of U.S.-Soviet strategic parity, in particular, have raised anew the issue of American reliability. The credibility of the U.S. strategic deterrent is sometimes doubted. The emergence of Soviet superiority at the intermediate nuclear level has raised new questions as to the coupling of the defense of Europe and the U.S. strategic deterrent.

That a great debate over the future of the Atlantic alliance should evolve out of such circumstances is hardly odd; indeed, it would be odd if one were not to take place. Not surprisingly, we are seeing challenges to the basic Atlantic model coming from all parts of the political spectrum. Both sides of the Atlantic are participating. What I should like to do today is make my modest contribution to this debate.

In the United States, it is significant that we are not witnessing a revival of traditional isolationism. Fortress America is not being promoted as a model of American well-being. Perhaps the notion is simply too discredited to hold much attraction; perhaps most have simply come to accept that the United States is too dependent upon, and interdependent with, the rest of the world to pursue this simplistic and dangerous option.

Other challenges to the Atlantic connection exist, however. There is, for example, an American school of thought that has come to be known as "global unilateralism." Adherents of this school begin with an appreciation of the global scope of U.S. interests. They note the broad range of possible threats to the United States. And they would reduce the U.S. commitment to Europe so that we could enhance our flexibility to act everywhere.

This approach is flawed. All interests are not vital; all are not equal. The balance of power in Europe is central to world stability and American involvement in Europe is central to the balance there. Moreover, our range of ties, commercial and cultural, cannot be duplicated or done without. The reality is that there is no cheap way of protecting these interests. Deterrence, to be credible, requires a large U.S. continental commitment; it also requires that we act together as a true coalition.

A second challenge is perhaps better known to you. For want of a better phrase I call it "Atlantic reconstruction." It manifests itself in several places—the Congress and the media most notably—and in several ways by, for example, threatening troop withdrawals or not funding defense programs critical to the defense of Europe.

The roots of this American movement are to be found in the soil of frustration and resentment. There is a growing belief in the United States that Europeans are not doing their share, be it to defend themselves or to defend common interests around the world. Sometimes tied to this view is the belief that Europe's commitment to détente outweighs its commitment to the alliance, that Europe is more concerned with its economic well-being than with Western defense. The reconstructionists want to end this alleged "free ride." They wish to send a signal to Europe to stimulate a larger European defense effort.

As is often the case, neither analysis nor prescription is accurate. That we all need to do more to strengthen deterrence is obvious. And that there is a requirement for equity on defense efforts in a coalition of democratic states is also clear. More must be done, and the Reagan administration has worked hard to increase defense spending on both sides of the Atlantic. At the same time, we have sought to deflate misconceptions about allied contributions to the common defense. There is not enough awareness, for example, that should conflict arise in Europe, 90 percent of NATO's land forces and 75 percent of its sea and air forces would be European.

There are those who argue that we could improve the situation by cutting U.S. efforts. I do not doubt that by doing less in Europe the United States would, indeed, "send a signal." Unfortunately, it would be the wrong signal with the wrong result. In the name of enhancing deterrence and defense, those who would cut back America's contribution could well achieve precisely the opposite. Reducing U.S. strength and raising questions about the U.S. commitment are hardly self-evident ways of promoting peace and stability.

An even greater debate is taking place on this side of the Atlantic. This is to be expected, given the immediacy of the issues here. Let me address briefly what I see as the principal alternatives being presented.

Neutralism. Three schools of thought appear to dominate. The first would exchange the alliance for neutralism. Some go as far as to see this neutralism embracing all of Europe, West and East. It is argued that a Europe without allegiance to either bloc and without significant military forces would be a safer haven, less likely to be drawn into a confrontation between the two superpowers. Somewhat differently, it is asserted that Europe (and especially Germany) could make its most important contribution to peace by serving as a bridge between the two superpowers, explaining one to the other.

These are romantic visions. With or without its Eastern neighbors, a weak and neutral Western Europe would be under the sway of the strongest continental power, the Soviet Union. What is needed for peace is less a bridge than a bulwark. Our problems with the U.S.S.R. are not caused by a lack of communication, although communication is important. Our problems with the U.S.S.R are caused by a lack of Soviet restraint and respect for the interests and well-being of others.

Armed Independence. Some recognize these realities and, instead, argue for a Western Europe that is strong, independent of the United States, and able to provide fully for its own security. An image of a European military entity is held up, the analogue to European political cooperation and economic integration. In this model, Europe would thus be able to mediate between the two powers from a position of strength—able to deter one without being tied to the other. European interests would prosper, we are told.

I can do no better in describing this school of thought than by quoting Hedly Bull of Oxford University:

> "The course that the Western European countries should now be exploring may be called the Europeanist one. It requires the countries of Western Europe to combine more closely together, increase their defense efforts, and take steps toward reducing their military dependence on America."

Professor Bull's vision, too, suffers from a lack of realism. Europe at present lacks the requisite political basis for constituting such collective management of its security. It is not clear that European states would be willing to make the necessary political commitments and economic investment. And it is not at all certain that the emergence of an independent, armed Europe—with conventional and nuclear forces alike—could occur without crisis or even conflict. Indeed, the security and stability we all know and enjoy now could be jeopardized by such development.

Reconstruction. A third approach is embodied by proposals now coming from opposition parties in northern Europe. In many respects, these ideas are the mirror image of the proposals offered by American reconstructionists. The European reconstructionists have several goals: to lessen the influence of the United States; to reduce the likelihood of nuclear war in Europe; to carry out a more independent policy toward Moscow; and to promote European interests around the world as they see fit. They seek not to leave the alliance so much as to change it from within.

Even such "reformist" policies are not without major difficulties; indeed, they draw upon several of the worst features of the two alternatives just discussed. We should not delude ourselves. Conventional defense needs strengthening. But more robust conventional defense efforts will not make nuclear forces irrelevant or redundant. Soviet conventional and nuclear advantages must be offset, whether by deployments, arms reductions, or both. The bond between forces in Europe and U.S. strategic deterrence, or coupling, must be maintained. At the same time, conventional force improvements will prove costly; a consensus for a major increase in the level of defense effort has yet to emerge. And heightened European independence from the United States has its risks; Europeans cannot choose when they wish to enjoy the fruits of alliance and when they do not. There is room for disagreement and difference within the alliance but not for selective commitment.

Neutralism, armed independence, reconstruction—these are the three basic European alternatives to the current Atlanticist framework for Western security.

Cutting across these approaches are various themes which would also alter the current Atlantic bridge in a decisive manner.

Antinuclearism is one such idea. The aim is to reduce or, if possible, eliminate the presence of nuclear weapons in Europe and with them the risk of nuclear war. The most ardent enthusiasts of this proposition would do so unilaterally in hopes of eliciting parallel Soviet restraint.

But I agree with Harold Brown's observation about U.S.-Soviet arms competition: "When we build, the Soviet Union builds; and when we don't build, the Soviet Union still builds." Moreover, unilateral actions by the West would undermine our best chance for meaningful arms control negotiations. More seriously, unilateral nuclear disarmament would threaten deterrence and heighten the vulnerability of the West, too.

Nor can there be a policy of "no first use" of nuclear weapons. The effect would once again be decoupling and thus erode, not enhance, deterrence. It is the prospect of the use of nuclear weapons and the full weight of American might which helps to keep the peace in Europe.

Wishing away the possibility that nuclear weapons will be used is not enough. Declarations are simply words. Meanwhile, Soviet conventional, chemical, and nuclear capabilities are real and increasing. Were the alliance to adopt a policy of no first use of nuclear weapons, the danger of conventional war—which would be incredibly destructive in our age—would be increased and with it the possibility of nuclear tragedy. More than 50 million people perished in World War II; we cannot adopt policies which would heighten the risk of conventional, not to mention nuclear, war in Europe.

Lastly, there are those who remain within the alliance or Atlantic house but who place all their hopes on arms control. Arms control—whether some version of a nuclear freeze or negotiations more broadly—is held up as the panacea for Europe's dilemma. Only arms control, it is alleged, offers the means to limit the threat, reduce the levels of weapons and the spending on them, and promote renewed détente.

But such hopes cannot live in isolation. Arms control will only prosper if the Soviet Union has incentive to negotiate; what is required to bring this about is a sound military foundation on our part. Nor can arms control be expected to persuade the Soviet leadership to eschew the role of force; Soviet policy at home and abroad depends on it too much. Arms control has the potential to buttress our security and deterrence; it cannot take the place of our collective efforts to do the same.

In more normal times, debates involving competing conceptions of alliance security would be welcomed. Over years or even decades, we would perhaps create a new consensus. But 1983 is not a normal time. To the contrary, 1983 could well turn out to be the most important year in the history of the Atlantic alliance since its inception.

The reason for so stating is clear. To a degree unlike any other year since 1949, the determination and credibility of the alliance are being tested. How we implement the December 1979 decision on intermediate nuclear forces will have a major impact on our future. Those who would apply their abstract or idealized notions of how best to structure the Atlantic relationship to determine the outcome of the INF debate should only do so with a full understanding of what is at stake.

Not surprisingly, this temptation exists. There are those in the United States who wonder why we should go to such lengths to bring about the implementation of the decision. They are unhappy that so many facets of the U.S.-European relationship are held hostage to the INF decision and cite the possibility that deployment of U.S. missiles in Europe could heighten the risk of a direct Soviet nuclear attack on the American homeland.

On this side of the Atlantic, there are those—particularly the new neutralists—who maintain precisely the opposite. They argue that new U.S. weapons based on the Continent would enable us to localize or limit an East-West nuclear exchange to Europe. Others simply argue that the new missiles are not necessary because the Soviet Union has no intention of exploiting its current INF monopoly. Or, in yet another variation, there are those who are prepared to wait indefinitely for arms control to solve the security problem created by SS-20 deployment. In every case, they seek to opt out of implementing the 1979 decision.

The fallacies in each of these approaches are manifest. The United States cannot be secure for long in a world in which Western Europe is not. Americans who would weaken or remove the U.S. nuclear guarantee would jeopardize the prospects for stability and peace everywhere. In the name of reducing risk to themselves, they will have raised it for everyone.

European opponents of deployment are also mistaken. The effect of new U.S. missiles would not be to limit or localize a nuclear exchange in Europe but rather to prevent one. Indeed, it is in part through the threat of escalation and full American involvement that we help to promote stability and deterrence in Europe. Indeed, no better proof for this proposition exists than Defense Minister Ustinov's recent comment that the Soviet Union would respond to a strike by U.S. systems in Europe by directly attacking the United States. If that's not coupling, I don't know what is.

Those who maintain no new deployments are needed, whether owing to Soviet good will or the prospects of arms control, are simply deluding themselves. It is probably true that Western Europe could live with a Soviet preponderance of force; but to expect the Soviets not to exploit any advantage for its own paranoic, political purposes is to ignore every lesson of history. Similarly, the U.S.S.R. cannot be expected to negotiate seriously in the absence of any incentive to do so; deployment, either in promise or in fact, remains our best and only way to get the Soviets to come to the negotiating table in good faith.

In short, the implementation of the INF double-track decision has become the touchstone for Western security in the 1980's. The decision continues to have a sound political and a sound military rationale. It was taken in response to an unprovoked Soviet buildup which continues unabated. It represents continued alliance commitment to a concept of deterrence predicated on the notion that American power tied to Europe is the best way of promoting European stability and peace. The commitment of the Reagan administration and allied governments to pursuing both tracks—arms control and, if need be, deployment—of the 1979 decision is now unshakeable.

My support for decisions taken some 3 1/2 years ago and my criticism of various alternative visions of the alliance should not be interpreted as complacency. The flaws of the various alternatives I have described should not be taken as a complete dismissal of their validity. Nor should it be understood as a complete endorsement of the status quo. If I may modify an old American adage for my purposes here tonight, I would simply advise against fixing the alliance more than it is broken. Or, to shift metaphors, I would simply urge you to beware of cures worse than the disease.

This is not a call for standing pat. Reform is needed. So too is close consultation. We must upgrade not only our nuclear deterrent but also our conventional forces. More must be done to safeguard common interests outside the formal treaty area. We must ensure that our commercial relations with the East are consistent with our political and security requirements. And we must continue to be imaginative and flexible in our search for meaningful arms control agreements.

We must be careful, though, in how we proceed. Europe in the 30 years since the Second World War has been spared armed conflict. We have achieved levels of prosperity and freedom without historical precedent. Too much is at stake to go ahead precipitously or recklessly. The alliance and the basic Atlantic model or structure remain relevant and viable. Only within its contours can we harness the resources of the West in a manner which maximizes effectiveness and minimizes the burden on our free societies and strained economies.

There is a wonderful line from the novel, The Leopard, by the Italian author Giuseppe di Lampedusa. "If we want things to stay as they are, things will have to change." To a degree this is true. Indeed, the history of the alliance is a series of adaptations to evolving circumstances. The alliance of 1983 is not the alliance of 1949.

Yet, there must also be limits to our departures. The essentials of the Atlantic model that is the alliance have served us well and should be saved. The alliance can continue to safeguard our interests if we are as wise about what to keep as we are about what to change.

Transcript of a Press Conference by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), May 4, 1983 (Extracts) [27]

"The British and French Simply Will Not Accept . . . the Inclusion of Their Different Kinds of Systems, Their Strategic Systems in These Negotiations"

. . . . . .

Q. Do you regard the Andropov speech of yesterday [28] as in any sense a Soviet concession on the arms control?

A. Well, I think it's a change and we believe that warheads are certainly one of the better or more effective ways of counting the destructive power of these missiles, and therefore a more appropriate and realistic point to use in the calculations that have to be made. But there certainly is not at any point a basic willingness to make the kinds of reductions that the President has been talking about and there are a lot things left unsaid in the proposal. We don't really know whether there is a willingness to destroy the SS–20's that would be surplus to the amounts he's mentioned.

If they're simply going to move them to some point east of the Urals, that's bad for two reasons. It's very bad for our eastern allies, since they can be rolled back into position in Europe in a matter of hours, it doesn't help that situation. To the extent that it indicates that they're willing to use a more effective and appropriate means of counting, I think there could be said to be a change there, yes.

Q. Progress?

A. Well, I would hope so. If not by itself, I don't think so much as that it perhaps is an indication that maybe something more useful and closer to what the President has proposed might conceivably be forthcoming. The thing that bothers me about it a little bit more is the fact that it again goes back to this point of insisting on counting French and British systems. It is widely known that that has been something that has been totally and completely and I think appropriately refused by the British and French. And therefore, in one sense it could be said simply to be a means of trying to get European public opinion back on the side of no deployment, but at the same time sending forth a proposal that brings the conference to a halt. Because it is widely known that the British and French simply will not accept and should not accept the inclusion of their different kinds of systems, their strategic systems in these negotiations.

Q. Mr. Secretary, whether the British and French accept it or not, can some provisions be made within the context of START and/or INF to take into account those 162 missiles?

A. Not really. I don't think because you're not talking about things that are equally under central direction. The Soviet missiles are all under centralized direction. The French and the British systems are independent systems run by independent sovereign nations and designed for a different purpose. So I wouldn't think that that is going to be a very useful [28] Soviet leader Yuri V. Andropov, at a dinner honoring the visit of East German leader Erich Honecker, stated: "We are prepared to reach agreement on the equality of nuclear potentials in Europe both as regards delivery vehicles and warheads with due account, of course, for the corresponding armaments of Britain and France.

"In other words, we stand for the U.S.S.R. to have no more missiles and warheads mounted on them than on the side of NATO in each mutually agreed-upon period. In the event of a reduction of the number of warheads on British and French missiles, the number of warheads on our medium-ranged missiles would be cut by as much. The same approach would be applied also to the aviation systems of this class deployed in Europe. Thereby an approximate equality would be maintained between the U.S.S.R. and NATO both as regards medium-range nuclear-weapon delivery vehicles, that is missiles and aircraft, and by the number of warheads carried by them. More than that, this equality would be on a much lower level than now." (Excerpts, as translated by Soviet press agency Tass, printed in New York Times, May 4, 1983, A16) path to pursue, if we really want arms reduction results.

. . . . . .

Q. On the Andropov proposal, why shouldn't the British and French missiles be considered in the equation?

A. First of all, because they're British and French systems and it's up to the British and French to decide what they want to do with them. We have no authority to include them in any discussions that we're conducting.

Secondly, they are not intermediate systems. They are long-range intercontinental systems. Their presence does not in any sense relate to the subject under discussion which is the SS-20's and weapons of that intermediate range. There is no NATO or Western counter to the SS-20's in place at the moment. The Soviet attempt to include a strategic system is somewhat akin to our saying, oh, and by the way, you have to throw in some of your 18's and 19's into this same negotiation. It isn't the same kind of weapons system at all, and since it is widely known that the British and French have said they would not include any of their systems in these discussions, it represents at least one way in which the discussions can be deadlocked without appearing to have been the fault of the Soviets to have done so and that's what we re concerned with. We think that it is essential that deployment proceed, of the ground-launched cruise missile and the Pershing II's, unless an agreement that does fit the President's proposals and criteria that he's laid down is actually achieved.

Q. But from the Soviet point of view, those are nuclear missiles, whether they're long range or short range or aimed at their country, and—

A. From our point of view and the British point of view so are the Soviet submarines and so are the Soviet longer-range missiles and all the rest. From everybody's point of view a nuclear missile is a nuclear missile. But when you have a negotiation that is considering a specific set of weapons, it doesn't really add to the possibilities of securing an agreement to insist that weapons in other categories be included, particularly weapons of nations that have said they will not be part of this particular discussion with respect to those weapons. So it does have within it the elements of sounding like a pretty good thing, and plausible which is what it's designed to do, I suppose, to help give arguments to people who don't want deployment, but then at the same time to raise conditions which the proposer knows cannot be fulfilled.

Statement by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the Council of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, Paris, May 9, 1983 [29]

The Problem of East-West Trade

It is a pleasure to be back at the OECD Council after an absence of ten years. I appreciate this chance to share with you my Government's thinking on the work of today's session.

We meet at a time of hope for the world economy. As Secretary Regan has pointed out, economic recovery is underway. After some very difficult years of recession and hardship in all our countries, the United States is headed in 1983 for a year of unmistakeable and significant growth. We know that American recovery, as in the past, will be an important facet in stimulating recovery throughout the OECD area, and in the developing world. Having wrung inflation out of our system—and if we all maintain the requisite discipline in our national policies—the world could be headed for a long period of sustained, noninflationary expansion.

This trend of recovery has a symbolic as well as an economic significance: It reminds us of the extraordinary resilience of the free political and economic institutions which we all share. For all our temporary setbacks, the free economies have brought about, since 1945, a generation of growth and prosperity unprecedented in history. On the other side of this cruelly divided continent, economic problems are structural and systemic. Inefficiencies are built-in; innovation is inhibited; stagnation is endemic; any effective economic reforms would weaken the grip of rigid central political control and are therefore excluded. Our economic difficulties are largely problems of self-discipline, of better management of fiscal and monetary policy; their problems are inherent and fundamental.

Two conclusions follow from this. First, the industrial democracies represented in this organization must remember that they have a precious heritage. And second, it seems to me that we all have a special responsibility to address the problem of East-West economic relations with some care.

It is no accident that the Ministerial Council of last May [30] and the Heads of State and Government at last year's economic summit, [31] agreed that the OECD should keep East-West economic and financial relations under review.

I am happy to say that since then the OECD, and the IEA, have done some valuable research and analysis which enhance our understanding of East-West trade and its implications. We urge these organizations to continue their important work. In a few moments, I will express my thoughts on areas for future exploration. Let me first explain my Government's view of the main issues involved.

If the relationship between East and West were a normal relationship among states, we would not be here discussing this subject. As long as present conditions exist, these relations are not normal and can not be treated as normal--for many reasons, economic as well as political. The issue is not waging "economic warfare" against the Soviet Union which would be futile, but maintaining the health of the international economy in the unique conditions of the East-West relationship, which is essential.

Of course, there are security concerns. We have learned from experience that some economic transactions with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe can confer strategic benefits, ease constraints on resource allocation or create dependencies. The United States and its allies are examining some of these issues in other forums.

But the concerns we wish to raise at the OECD are, properly, economic concerns. The Secretary-General's note on the subject, which I commend, provides an excellent analysis of the complications which East-West trade introduces into the global economic system. The United States believes that economic relations with the East must, at a minimum, be conducted on sound economic principles so as not to jeopardize either the security or the prosperity of the democratic nations. The OECD has a legitimate and essential role to play in establishing and maintaining such principles. It is appropriate here to pay tribute to the fine study of energy security just completed jointly by the OECD and IEA. I hope we will endorse this study at the meeting.

Any analysis of the problem must begin with an appreciation of the fundamental discontinuity between the world market and the command economies and state trading systems of the East. With some exceptions, East-West trade has traditionally involved the exchange of relatively advanced Western technology for Eastern raw materials and semi-finished goods. The machinery and equipment which we sell them convey more than simply additions to their capital stock; these highly sophisticated products of our technological development contain a part of our intellectual capital which conveys a certain advantage to the East not compensated for by the raw materials and semi-finished goods we receive in return. The East's inability to take full advantage of the capabilities of this equipment only highlights the imbalance.

Thus, there is a basic incompatibility between the Eastern and Western economies. As the Secretary General's note suggests, the main causes of the depressed state of East-West trade are to be found in the structural inefficiencies of Communist central economic planning. For this reason, the degree of complementarity and interdependence that has developed between North and South has not developed and probably cannot develop between East and West. The simple fact is that manufactured goods produced in the East are frequently not competitive in the [30] The OECD Council met in Paris at the ministerial level, May 10-11, 1982.

[31] Reference is to the Versailles Summit Conference, held in Paris, June 4-6, 1982.

West, and the capacity of the Eastern countries to export additional raw materials is limited.

These facts suggest that East–West trade would remain at a low level if not for subsidies or other forms of political intervention that boosted it to artificially higher levels. By the laws of comparative advantage, this practice—by definition—is inefficient and distorts the proper functioning of a world economy. Thus the more pervasive problem we face today is not political interference restricting East–West trade but political interference maintaining it. If the governments represented in this organization have differing views of the political implications of East–West trade, the fairest—and economically most efficient—compromise would be to agree to let sound economic principles govern.

Sound economic principles also tell us something about the debt problem. The Eastern countries' difficulty in servicing their external debt is aggravated if not caused by their inability to compete in world markets. It is clear in retrospect that more prudence could have been exercised in lending to certain Eastern European countries in the 1970's. Gross hard currency indebtedness of the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe rose from $8 billion in 1971 to $90 billion in 1981—a growth rate of 24 percent per year.

Today, we are all fully conscious of the dangers of such overextension, and it has taught us a lesson: we should apply to our economic relations with the East the same prudent commercial and financial criteria that we would apply to any other business venture. That these risks persist is shown by the hesitancy of the private sector to provide new financing. There are sometimes sound reasons for Western financial support for certain Eastern countries. As a general rule, however, the best course is to recognize that a price is paid whenever such economic activity is stimulated artificially by government in defiance of the judgment of the market.

A third problem in East–West economic relations is the attempt by the state trading countries of the East to use their monopsonistic power to shift the balance of advantage in their favor, such as by playing Western suppliers off against one another to obtain preferential credits, buyback arrangements, or other special advantages. These anticompetitive practices have a great potential to do harm to all our countries. We will have to find ways to deal with this problem without, of course, resorting to anticompetitive practices of our own that would further distort the economic system.

There is much that the OECD can do to help us protect our interests, and our economies, in the face of these challenges posed by trade with the East. Let me make some specific suggestions in this regard.

In the course of the last year, this organization and its committees have done a great deal of useful work in this area. I have already mentioned the excellent report of the joint OECD–IEA study on energy security. And progress has been made toward developing a new consensus on export-credit policies.

The Secretary General's note on the subject of East–West trade and financial relations is a comprehensive and valuable summary of the current state of these relations. Its economic analysis is balanced and objective. It is firmly grounded on the findings of the trade committee. Its conclusions are valid, and they illuminate the need for governments to exercise caution in the conduct of East–West economic policy.

We strongly endorse the Secretary General's conclusions, as well as his proposals for further work to be done by this organization. The OECD has a major role to play in monitoring the patterns and trends in the West's trading and financial relations with the East. Only if governments have this kind of information can we even begin to assess the balance of commercial advantages or to consider what steps could be taken to protect Western interests. For example:

The Eastern countries, facing lagging exports, are attempting to pay for an ever-larger share of their imports by compensation deals and barter arrangements. We all have an interest in having these inefficient practices monitored by the OECD.

I have already mentioned the state trading countries' attempts to play off Western suppliers against each other for special advantage. To safeguard against such manipulation, the United States has suggested that it would be in the common interest of Western nations to exchange information on major projects planned in the East. It need not involve proprietary information on major projects planned in the East. We believe that the OECD is well situated and well suited to play such a role.

We hope that the OECD will not shrink from the more active role I have described. The OECD's expert staff are a unique resource; they should not be confined to the simple gathering and basic analysis of data. We should strive constantly to broaden the kinds and quantities of information we share with each other on the subject of East–West trade, to enable us to assess the balance of advantages between East and West. We will then be in a position to correct imbalances in that trade and to formulate policies, individually and collectively, that will protect our common interests.

Madam Chairman, [32] as a step in that direction we hope that clear conclusions will emerge from today's discussion and be reflected in our communiqué. We believe that the conclusions suggested by the Secretary-General in his note are a good starting point for our discussion. We also endorse the Secretary-General's proposals for strengthening the organization's work program, which are aimed at improving the quality of our assessments and our policy conclusions.

Madam Chairman, this extraordinary organization of democratic nations embraces many different points of view on the subject of relations with the East. There will not be unanimity here on the security, or the political, or even on all the economic dimensions of the problem. That is not the purpose of this organization. But the same economic realities hold for all of us. We face a common problem, and there are many things we can do together to protect our common interests and our peoples' well-being. Simple prudence requires it. We all know the ancient maxim: Caveat emptor: let the buyer beware. Some sellers should beware also.

In the last analysis, we in this room have much more in common than we have that differs. We share a dedication to economic and political freedom, to the welfare of our people, and to the cause of peace. We have all learned by now that in an interdependent world economy, no one nation can meet its challenges alone. Much can be achieved, on the other hand, through cooperation. The United States is prepared to work together with you here in that spirit.

Communiqué Issued by the Council of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development at the Ministerial Level, Paris, May 10, 1983 [33]

A Commitment to Noninflationary Growth and International Economic Cooperation

1. At its meeting on 9th–10th May, the Council of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development at Ministerial level agreed on a medium-term approach to sustaining and broadening the economic recovery now under-way. They agreed that increased sustainable non-inflationary growth in the OECD countries now must be aimed at in order to reduce the present very high levels of unemployment.

2. Ministers recognised that the powerful economic linkages among countries and regions imply a collective responsibility to shape policies so as to strengthen the international trading, monetary and financial systems.

3. Accordingly, their governments intend to:

—Take advantage of the room for growth, which is now emerging in an important part of the OECD area, to promote job creation and higher employment.

—Continue to reduce inflation and overcome structural impediments to improved economic performance.

—Make use, individually and collectively, of the favourable conditions provided by economic recovery to reverse protectionist trends.

—Work to resolve international debt problems in a trade-expansionary way as recovery and adjustment by debtor countries proceed.

—Provide more effective help to the poorer developing countries.

4. The meeting was chaired by Madame Colette Flesch, Vice-President of the Government of Luxembourg, Minister of Foreign Affairs, External Trade and Co-operation, Minister of Economy and Middle Classes. The Vice-Chairmen were Mr. Shintaro Abe, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Japan and Mr. Kurt Furgler, Federal Counsellor and Head of the Swiss Federal Department of Economic Affairs. In addition to reviewing their economic policies, and trade relations among Member countries, Ministers considered the difficult situation of the developing countries and the policies needed if they are to benefit from economic recovery. They discussed the dialogue with the developing countries, in particular preparations for UNCTAD VI.[34] Ministers also reviewed East–West economic relations.

5. Finally, Ministers heard a report by Mr. William F. Birch, Minister of Energy of New Zealand, on the results of the Ministerial Meeting of the Governing Board of the International Energy Agency, held on 8th May, 1982, in Paris. They took note of the study, Energy Requirements and Security, prepared by the Secretariat, and of the discussions on it, and endorsed the conclusions set forth in the Annex to this Communiqué.

THE TRANSITION TO SUSTAINED GROWTH

6. Ministers welcomed the further achievements in reducing inflation. They are very concerned, however, about the high and rising levels of unemployment. It is therefore encouraging that signs of an up-turn have now emerged in several OECD economies. While uncertainties and risks remain, Ministers agreed that prospects for continuing recovery are better than they have been for several years, and that ensuring the transition to sustained non-inflationary growth and higher employment is the central task of policy.

Common Policy Principles

7. Ministers agreed on the following policy principles for all Member countries:

(i) Policies need to be set firmly in a medium-term framework to make clear the steadiness of policy intent. This will, of necessity, call for flexibility in the implementation of policies when circumstances require.

(ii) Pervasive economic linkages mean that the ability of individual countries to achieve domestic policy objectives depends importantly on the policies and performance of others. It is important for the consistency of policies that each Member country take account of the international implications of Member countries' policies taken together.

(iii) The achievement of greater exchange rate stability, which does not imply rigidity, is a major objective and commitment to be pursued. In this context they noted and welcomed the principles set out in the agreement by finance ministers of seven Member countries, announced in Washington on April 29th, 1983.

(iv) Improved economic performance and higher employment require a balanced use of macro-economic and structural policies. Growing room emerges as inflation diminishes and supply-side responsiveness increases. To this end:

—Macro-economic policies should be consistent with medium-term objectives of inflation control and steadier real growth; some countries have found a nominal income framework helpful in this respect.

—Policies to increase the profitability of job-creating productive investment are required.

—Collective bargaining should take account of the need to promote investment and to maximise the scope for higher employment without inflation.

—Positive adjustment policies are necessary to enhance competition and the flexibility of markets, and to improve the allocation of resources.

—Labour market policies are important to alleviate the burden of unemployment, particularly on young people; targeted programmes, including training, can help to deal with the problem of structural unemployment.

[34] The Sixth U.N. Conference on Trade and Development was held in Belgrade, June 6–July 3, 1983.

—Facilitating stronger social consensus can in many countries play an important role in achieving the necessary balance of policies.

8. While these policy principles are common to all Member countries, Ministers recognised that countries are in diverse situations. Not all countries have been equally successful in establishing the preconditions for better economic performance. Appropriate policies therefore differ in emphasis from one country to another.

National Policies

9. In a number of countries, accounting for about 70 per cent of OECD GNP, inflation is approaching the level of the 1960s. Confidence has strengthened; progress has been made in tackling structural imbalances; and activity, which has been weak, is now starting to recover. Further declines in real interest rates should be aimed at. For such countries, Ministers agreed on the importance of taking advantage of the room that has emerged for increased output and employment; in particular:

—As regards monetary policy, monetary aggregates should allow for output growth which is sustainable over the medium-term, with continued control of inflation, permitting a continued easing of interest rates. Current monetary policies are generally consistent with this approach. Targets for monetary aggregates should not be lowered in response to lower oil prices. Similarly, monetary policy should not accommodate any resurgence of inflationary wage and other income claims.

—Fiscal policy should be consistent with sustained non-inflationary growth, higher investment and higher employment. Structural budget deficits need to be reduced to make room for the investment needed to sustain growth and employment. Where future structural deficits loom large, it is important to act now to ensure that deficits on this scale will not materialise, thus permitting interest rates to ease. Given the strong international transmission of interest rates, such action would promote recovery in the world economy. The reduction of structural deficits should take care not to jeopardise economic recovery, and take account of the cumulative effects of simultaneous action in a large number of countries. Where measures to support activity are considered they should be designed to promote investment.

10. In some other countries, accounting for about 20 per cent of OECD GNP, further progress against inflation is required and structural impediments to better performance are more pronounced. As a result, growing room in the near-term is less. For such countries, Ministers agreed that perseverance with non-accommodating monetary policy is required, and structural budget deficits must be reduced further as part of a consistent medium-term approach. It is also particularly important that further efforts be made to reduce structural impediments.

11. In the remaining Member countries, despite serious efforts, inflation remains very high, while the international recession and chronic structural problems mean high rates of unemployment and underemployment. In such countries, Ministers agreed that limited flexibility of markets, structural imbalances, and difficulties in monetary and fiscal management are central problems, which must be addressed at their core. Improved economic performance remains primarily a task for domestic policies, although sustained recovery and lower interest rates in the OECD area, and an improving trade environment will make this easier.

TRADE, DEBT AND ADJUSTMENT

12. Ministers discussed the powerful linkages between growth, trade and debt which are now at work between creditor and debtor countries. They agreed on the importance of taking these linkages into account as fully as possible in the formulation of their macro-economic, trade and financial policies, and welcomed the work being done in the Organisation to help clarify the issues involved. They also recognised that the world recession had exposed problems of a systemic nature which need to be addressed.

13. Ministers noted that, during a period of severe and persistent economic and social difficulties, the world trading system has essentially been preserved. They recognised, however, that there has been a continuation and even extension of protectionist trade and domestic support measures to shelter weak industries and companies from the full impact of the recession and structural change. Such measures have contributed to slowing down the movement of resources into activities with greater growth and job-creating potential. A return to sustained growth requires more positive adjustment policies, more reliance on market forces and more productive investment.

14. Ministers agreed that, within the framework of their overall economic co-operation, strengthening the open and multilateral trading system is essential to support the recovery and the transition to sustained growth. They therefore agreed that the economic recovery, as it proceeds, provides favourable conditions which Member countries should use, individually and collectively, to reverse protectionist trends and to relax and dismantle progressively trade restrictions and trade distorting domestic measures, particularly those introduced over the recent period of poor growth performance. They invited the Secretary-General to propose appropriate follow-up procedures. At the same time, they agreed that the work programmes now under way in the GATT and OECD to improve the trading system and its functioning should be actively pursued.

15. Ministers welcomed the co-operative efforts being made by the International Monetary Fund, the Bank for International Settlements, the governments of the debtor and creditor countries and the private banks to preserve the effective functioning of the international financial system. They also recognised the determined efforts now being made by many debtor countries to adjust to a less inflationary world.

16. The groundwork has thus been laid for evolving a medium-term approach to resolve debt problems in a trade-expansionary way as the recovery proceeds. The aim should be to maintain the basis for a continued flow of savings through world capital markets to countries where they can be productively used. A first element in such an approach is to maintain normal disciplines between borrowers and lenders. A second is that international lending will best serve the interests of both borrowers and lenders if external finance is used to develop efficient economies capable of, and enabled to, compete in world markets.

17. To this end Ministers agreed on the need for further efforts by both creditor and debtor countries to:

—Sustain a supply of finance to debtor countries, in support of determined domestic adjustment policies, that is sufficient to maintain or restore adequate levels of essential imports.

—Work towards mutually reinforcing action, within the framework of existing international agreements, to establish more predictable and transparent trade regimes, to reduce trade barriers and to pursue more market-conforming domestic structural policies.

Development Co-Operation, Dialogue and UNCTAD VI

18. Ministers welcomed and shared the importance attached to world economic interdependence, dialogue and consensus in declarations by developing countries, most recently at Buenos Aires. They reaffirmed their readiness to work, in a spirit of understanding and co-operation, with the developing countries and other participants at UNCTAD VI next month with the aim of reaching a common understanding of current world economic problems. In particular, they looked forward to discussing the contributions which developed and developing countries can make to further constructive dialogue and co-operation to:

—Ensure that all countries benefit from the economic recovery now getting underway, and that economic and social progress can gain momentum in the developing world.

—Continue to work together on development co-operation policies to tackle the fundamental problems of underdevelopment and poverty.

19. Ministers recognised that the world recession has created acute difficulties, in particular for most of the poorer developing countries. Meeting this challenge will call for difficult and courageous policies on their part. As recovery proceeds, these countries should benefit from increased export demand and higher commodity prices. But Ministers recognised that external support remains of crucial importance to facilitate the resumption of their longer-term development. They therefore agreed to:

—Maintain and, as far as possible, to increase their aid with a view to realising their commitments to the international aid objectives particularly for the poorer developing countries.

—Work together with the competent international institutions to assist poorer developing countries in implementing the difficult policy reforms required for adjustment and resumed development progress.

—Ensure adequate funding from all contributors of the multilateral development institutions, in particular the International Development Association.

20. Ministers agreed on the desirability of diversifying the developing countries' sources of external finance, and in particular fuller use of the potential for direct investment.

21. Ministers stressed the commitment of their governments to pursue development co-operation policies beyond the immediate requirements of economic recovery. They recognised, in particular, the importance of working with developing countries to strengthen and achieve greater stability in their export earnings. They also recognised the importance of technical co-operation, and reaffirmed their commitment to a strong centrally funded system of United Nations technical co-operation.

East–West Economic Relations

22. Following a decision taken by Ministers last year, the Organisation has carried out a thorough economic analysis of the evolution of trade and financial relations with the USSR and other Eastern European countries. Ministers noted that these relations have, with some exceptions, evolved in a less dynamic way than those with more market-oriented economies and not met earlier expectations.

23. This purely economic analysis demonstrates that East–West trade and credit flows should be guided by the indications of the market. In the light of these indications, Governments should exercise financial prudence without granting preferential treatment. Ministers recognised, moreover, that practices connected with the state-trading system of centrally planned economies can create problems which need to be kept under close examination within the Organisation. More generally, they agreed that, in the light of changing circumstances, the Organisation should continue to review East–West economic relations.

ANNEX

Conclusions

1. Ministers assessed world energy requirements and security for the next two decades, bearing in mind the importance of adequate and secure energy supplies to the prospects for sustained economic growth. They noted with satisfaction the progress that had been made since 1973 in reducing dependence on imported oil by increasing energy efficiency and the use of alternative fuels, notably coal, gas and nuclear energy. This progress has contributed to the lowering of oil prices which is now bringing an important and welcome relief to the world economy. Ministers agreed, however, that such relief was likely to be temporary and that there is a risk of a renewed energy constraint on growth later in this decade unless the industrialised countries strengthen their policies to restructure their energy economies. Ministers noted, in this context, that dependence on imported oil, though reduced, remains high in many of their countries and that this remains the major risk to their energy security; that the contributions of coal and nuclear energy are running significantly below earlier expectations; that the prospect of growing imports of gas to help reduce dependence on imported oil could lead to heavy dependence by some countries on single sources of gas supply; and that the outlook for investment in the efficient use of energy and for the development of indigenous energy sources is less than satisfactory. They agreed that some of these problems could be accentuated by the uncertain outlook for oil prices.

2. Since industrialised countries as a whole will, in any event, continue to rely heavily on imported energy, smoothly functioning world energy markets over the long-term will be essential for their economic well-being. Industrialised countries must seek to reduce the risk of disruptions and be prepared to minimise the effects on their economies of any which occur. The balance between energy security and costs will have to be struck under the responsibility and in the circumstances of individual countries, having regard to their international commitments. Each country will, however, continue to develop strong and cost-effective energy policies based on that combination of market forces and government action which is best suited to its circumstances but including:

—implementing and as necessary strengthening present policies to promote the efficient use of energy and the continuing replacement of oil by other fuels;

—rapid and, where appropriate cooperative, development on an economic basis of indigenous energy resources—fossil fuels, nuclear energy, hydropower and other renewable energies—to the maximum possible extent consistent with environmental and social factors and the need to secure supplies beyond the turn of the century;

—seeking to remove impediments to its trade in energy;

—substantial programmes of research, development and demonstration;

—pricing and fiscal regimes which promote the rational use of energy and the development of indigenous energy resources;

—diversification of sources of energy imports;

—cooperation on a regional basis or as otherwise appropriate to improve the overall flexibility of energy systems and to overcome transit problems;

—effective cooperative measures for dealing with disruptions in energy supplies.

Ministers recognised that energy security and smoother functioning of world energy markets is not a matter for industrialised countries alone. More effective energy policies in the industrialised area should ease the world energy situation and thereby the energy situation of the non-oil developing countries. They emphasised the importance of mutual understanding with energy exporting and importing developing countries to the achievement of these aims. Development of the indigenous energy resources, including new and renewable energy, of the developing countries could in its turn make an important contribution to improving the world energy situation.

Energy Efficiency

3. Ministers recognised the important potential contribution of improved energy efficiency to overall energy security and agreed to give particular attention as appropriate to:

—financial or other measures to stimulate the efficient use of energy and conversion from oil including help to industry and others to overcome the high initial investment costs of certain energy-saving and fuel-switching measures;

—the development of energy conservation services capable of offering a comprehensive package which would include information on rational energy use and oil substitution, provision and installation of equipment, and financial advice tailored to the needs of customers;

—the publication of technical and financial information on the efficient use of energy and of any assessments which governments may make of long-term trends in energy demand, supply and prices;

—demonstration by governments within their own operations of the value of energy efficiency;

—inclusion of energy efficiency as an element in industrial policy;

—energy efficiency in transport and in the building sector through higher voluntary or mandatory standards;

—policies to overcome structural barriers which mute the impact of market signals.

Pricing and Fiscal Regimes

4. Ministers agreed to pay particular attention to:

—removal of those price regulations which discourage the development of indigenous energy or the displacement of oil by other fuels or the efficient use of energy;

—the pricing policies and where it exists regulation of the tariffs of electricity utilities so as not to impede the provision of funds for investment in new generating capacity;

—reviewing energy pricing policy, with the aims that energy prices should be more transparent and more closely reflect market prices or the long-term costs of maintaining supplies, as appropriate;

—the structuring of fiscal regimes for oil and gas production so as to encourage timely development.

Coal and Other Solid Fuels

5. Ministers agreed that to promote on an economic basis further expansion of production, use and trade of coal and, where appropriate, of other solid fuels including lignite and peat:

—their countries should continue to reduce impediments to a major expansion of coal use in electrical power generation and in industry;

—their countries should take steps to provide the infrastructure needed for increased production, transport and marketing of coal;

—coal-exporting countries should facilitate reliable coal exports in times of supply difficulties;

—their countries should promote the development of a flexible and diversified coal trading system, paying particular attention to the need for long-term contracts.

6. Coal use must be environmentally acceptable. Ministers agreed to accelerate co-operative efforts to promote strategies for the clean use of coal, including research, development and demonstration regarding coal use technologies, and to establish effective regulatory frameworks which allow coal users to choose the most economic means to achieve environmental goals. They will assess available and new technologies and review regularly the pace and impact of their introduction.

Nuclear Power

7. To fulfil its important potential for contributing to overall long-term energy security which is the concern of all industrialized countries, nuclear power will have to play a major and increasing role in many countries. Ministers:

—stressed the importance of encouraging stable trade in nuclear equipment, fuel cycle services and nuclear fuel. Export and import regulations must be predictable, and based on the strict respect of current non-proliferation policies;

—agreed that Member countries would maintain reliable standards of nuclear reactor safety and continue to co-operate in various fora on these matters. Procedures for the approval of reactors and nuclear facilities should be as clear and expeditious as possible;

—stressed the importance of international co-operation on spent fuel storage and waste disposal. They appealed to the governments of those countries in a position to do so to stimulate further progress in developing and applying effective and timely methods for managing the back end of the fuel cycle in ways best suited to their national situations and compatible with international agreements. The competent bodies of OECD were requested to work together on periodic consultations on the progress of member governments in the waste disposal programme;

—requested the competent bodies of OECD to identify for prompt examination new possibilities for research and development in advanced technologies that support these conclusions.

Action on these lines will provide the basis for both institutional impediments and public acceptance concerns on nuclear power to be vigorously addressed and allayed wherever possible.

Gas

8. Ministers agreed that gas has an important role to play in reducing dependence on imported oil. They also agreed, however, on the importance of avoiding the development of situations in which imports of gas could weaken rather than strengthen the energy supply security and thus the overall economic stability of Member countries. They noted the potential risks associated with high levels of dependence on single supplier countries. Ministers stressed the importance of expeditious development of indigenous OECD energy resources. They noted that existing contracts are currently insufficient to cover expected gas demand by the mid-1990s, and agreed that in filling this gap steps should be taken to ensure that no one producer is in a position to exercise monopoly power over OECD countries. To obtain the advantages of increased use of gas on an acceptably secure basis, they agreed that:

—their countries would seek to avoid undue dependence on any one source of gas imports and to obtain future gas supplies from secure sources, with emphasis on indigenous OECD sources. Additional supplies from other sources would be obtained from as diverse sources as possible, taking into account supply structures, the share of gas in energy balances, and the geographical situation of individual countries. In assessing the full costs of gas supply sources, gas companies and, as appropriate, governments will consider security factors;

—their Governments would either encourage gas companies and other undertakings concerned to take or take themselves the necessary and appropriate cost-effective measures suited to each country's situation to strengthen their ability to deal with supply disruptions; these measures could include increased gas storage facilities, contingency demand restraint programmes, improved fuel-switching capabilities accompanied by adequate stocks of oil or other alternative fuels, a more flexible grid structure, greater flexibility of contracts, more surge capacity, measures to accelerate intra-OECD trade on short notice through standby contracts for supplies in a disruption, and interruptible contracts with consumers;

—action should be taken to develop at economic cost indigenous gas resources, particularly in North America and the North Sea, which show promise of alleviating overall or particular pressures on energy imports;

—concerned member governments noting the potential for further development of North American gas resources and noting that part of the Norwegian Troll field may be declared commercial by 1984, would encourage their companies to begin negotiations on deliveries from these sources as soon as possible, with a view to making supplies available at prices competitive with other fuels in the mid-1990s;

—trade barriers and other barriers which could delay development of indigenous gas resources should be avoided or reduced;

—their governments would encourage the companies concerned to undertake feasibility studies, if appropriate in cooperation with member governments, to determine the economic, engineering, technical and financial factors, relevant to possible imports from a variety of non-OECD sources;

—governments within one region where there is scope for effective cooperation should invite gas companies operating in their jurisdictions to address and negotiate on a commercial basis cooperative arrangements to meet a disruption of supplies to any one country or to the region as a whole;

—special attention should be given in the annual country review process in various international organisations to the future pattern of gas supplies, to the progress on the development and implementation of security measures, and to whether gas imports into the OECD from any single source constitute such a proportion of total supplies as to give rise to concern about the timely development of indigenous resources and the vulnerability of supplies, either for an individual Member country or collectively;

—in considering the degree of vulnerability, relevant factors include the share of imports in total gas consumption and in total primary energy requirements, the reliability of particular sources, the flexibility of other supplies, sectoral distribution, stocks and fuel-switching possibilities;

—an in-depth exchange of views about this question would take place within the normal review process whenever considered necessary. To allow a full assessment of its energy situation, the country concerned shall inform the other member states if it plans major changes in its energy policy or gas supply pattern which are significant in the context of development of indigenous OECD resources and vulnerability of gas supplies.

Ministers expressed the view that special attention should be given in relevant international organisations to the gas import situation of individual countries and regions.

Oil

9. Ministers noted that since 1974, considerable progress has been made in improving energy security as far as oil is concerned. A continuation of these efforts will be necessary, however, as oil will remain by far the most important factor in OECD energy imports. Thus, in the year 2000 oil will still constitute more than 75% of all OECD energy imports. Ministers therefore agreed on the importance of strong cooperative arrangements for handling a major oil supply disruption and, in the case of IEA Ministers, on the need for continued improvement of the existing emergency allocation system, and the need to continue to encourage oil companies to support the improvement and, if necessary, the operation of the system. To strengthen their overall emergency preparedness, Ministers also agreed to continue to pay particular attention to the continued adequacy of their countries' oil stocks in terms of amount, structure and flexibility.

Other Energy Resources

10. Ministers reaffirmed their readiness to pursue policies both at the national and international level, aiming at exploitation of other indigenous energy resources such as hitherto unharnessed hydropower.

Transcript of a Press Briefing by the Secretary of Defense (Weinberger), Hamburg, May 30, 1983 (Extracts) [85]

The Need To Maintain NATO Defenses

. . . . . .

[Q.] Mr. Secretary, later this week you will be going to the FRG, to the NATO meeting in Brussels and then on to Norway. If you were asked to describe the situation along the central front of the alliance, what would your answer be?

[A.] NATO is strong; but the Soviets are far ahead—very far ahead—in the number of tanks, in troop strength and in the state of their readiness. As for us, we have reserves; matériel that can be readied; reinforcements that are planned. Still, the military situation as it is—particularly in view of the growing reinforcement of the Soviet capability and the very large number of SS–20 they have already deployed—that situation does not permit us to rest. We must get stronger, if we want to maintain deterrence.

[Q.] FRG Defense Minister Woerner recently had a statement released to Die Welt in which he said he would have to point out to you what "the limits of his (financial) capabilities" are. Given the budget problems in the NATO countries, will you continue to insist on the old concept of 3 percent real growth in defense expenditures?

[A.] The agreement was based on recommendations by NATO military leaders who felt that the alliance required a minimum growth rate in real terms of 3 percent over a number of years in order to maintain deterrence. As for me personally, I never thought that this three percent was all that was needed and then one could just stop. You can divide up three percent in a variety of ways—by raising salaries and military pay, for instance. But the real issue are the military requirements. If one translates that figure into greater efficiency, then three percent would be about right.

[Q.] NATO is increasingly confronted with the issue of possible conflicts outside its own territory. In this connection there has been talk of an 80,000-man force of reservists which the FRG is to hold in readiness in case the United States would have to withdraw personnel from Europe on short notice and deploy them outside the NATO area. Is there anything to this?

[A.] We are not thinking in terms of specific numbers because we obviously cannot predict what sort of an emergency might arise. The important thing is for NATO to think about these things and to make preparations outside the NATO area. There are two reasons for this. First, specific problems that might affect a member country might force that country to reduce its NATO presence. The best example of this was the Falklands crisis. It showed how important it is to have plans in readiness to fill gaps such as opened up when the British withdrew some of their forces for use in the Falklands. We did not have any such plans at the time; but we should have had them. Secondly, it could be that NATO could be defended more effectively in areas that lie outside the NATO area as such. One of the ways and means in which the alliance is defended—and I am mentioning only one instance here as an example—is in maintaining unrestricted access to the raw material resources of the Near East. It is very much to the advantage of NATO to think in terms of out-of-area missions which safeguard the operation of the defense alliance in Europe. Now, no one, I hope, will try to describe this in such a way as if America were looking for an adventure in the Near East and would therefore have to cut down on its troop presence in Europe. No, that might possibly be the most important theater of action where NATO would have to be defended.

Communiqué Issued by the North Atlantic Council at the Ministerial Level, Paris, June 10, 1983 [36]

Maintenance of Peace Through a Stable Military Balance

The North Atlantic Council met in Ministerial Session in Paris on 9th and 10th June, 1983. Ministers reaffirmed that their supreme objective is the maintenance of peace in freedom. A stable military balance is essential to this objective.

The countries of the Alliance are determined to ensure through negotiations that this balance will be established at the lowest possible level. They are equally determined to assure their security and their independence. They will defend the liberty and the justice on which their democracies are founded.

They have put forward a broad set of arms control and disarmament initiatives on:

strategic arms reductions (START)

intermediate range nuclear forces (INF)

Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions (MBFR)

a Conference on Confidence- and Security-Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe (CDE) a total ban on chemical weapons.

They call up the Soviet Union to demonstrate by its deeds an equal resolution to achieve concrete results in these negotiations.

As regards intermediate range nuclear forces, the Ministers affirmed the importance of the double-track decision taken on 12th December, 1979, by the countries concerned. They hope that, in the near future, a verifiable agreement providing for United States and Soviet equality can be reached in Geneva. If concrete results through negotiations cannot be reached, deployments as planned will begin as already decided in December 1979. [37]

1. Recognising that the cohesion and strength of the Alliance is of paramount importance for the preservation of peace and improved international relations, Ministers agreed as follows:

The Programme for Peace in Freedom adopted in the Bonn Summit Declaration of 10th June, 1982, [38] emphasises the Alliance's resolve to deter aggression by means of a strong defence and to develop through co-operation and dialogue, a constructive East-West relationship aimed at genuine détente. This balanced policy will continue to serve peace and uphold the independence and democratic values of the free peoples of the Alliance.

The Alliance remains a fundamental forum for close and regular consultation on matters of common concern and permits member states to adjust their aims and interests through free exchanges of views.

The maintenance of adequate defences by the Allied countries threatens no one. In Article 1 of the North Atlantic Treaty the members of the Alliance reaffirmed the undertaking to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations. This solemn obligation was restated in the Helsinki Final Act[39] signed by thirty-five countries and will always be fully honoured by the members of the Alliance. Each and every sovereign member of the Alliance is a guarantor that none of their weapons will be used except in response to attack.

2. The Allies view with concern the sustained increase in Soviet military strength in Europe and capability for military action world-wide, which far exceed defence needs. The Soviet Union maintains its build-up of conventional arms, chemical weapons, naval forces, nuclear forces, and in particular the deployment of SS-20 intermediate range nuclear missiles. Faced with this threatening situation, the Allies are resolved to ensure that conditions never exist which could tempt the Soviet Union to exploit its military power against any of the Allies. They are determined to meet the legitimate security requirements for the entire North Atlantic Treaty area. A sufficient level of both conventional and nuclear forces remains necessary for the credibility of deterrence. The security and sovereignty of the European members of the Alliance remain guaranteed by their own defences, by the presence of North American forces on European territory and by the United States strategic nuclear commitment to Europe. The United States and Canada likewise depend for their own security upon the contribution of the European partners to the defence of the Alliance.

3. The Allies have reviewed the trends of Soviet policies which bear upon Western interests. They are resolved to maintain a firm, realistic and constructive attitude and agree that it is important to maintain a dialogue, not least in periods of tension.

The Allies stress that respect for the obligation not to use force is mandatory and applicable between all states without exception. The reaffirmation of this obligation, contained in the United Nations Charter and the Helsinki Final Act, cannot substitute for deeds. The Allies therefore call on the Soviet Union for a complete end to the use of force in Afghanistan and the threat of use of force, as in the case of Poland. The exercise of restraint and responsibility by the Soviet Union is essential for the constructive relations which the Allies wish to establish with it. Such relations with the Soviet Union are possible on the full range of East–West issues.

The Allies look to the Soviet Union to contribute to the achievement of tangible results in the negotiations on arms control, disarmament and confidence-building measures, since this would enhance the credibility of the principle of non-use of force. They would welcome any serious proposals to improve confidence and co-operation between East and West.

4. The Allies deplore the continuing violation by the Polish authorities of the commitments undertaken by Poland in the Helsinki Final Act. They look to those authorities to honour the wish of the Polish people for national reconciliation, the release of political prisoners and the establishment of civil rights, including the right of the workers to have trade unions of their own choice. This would enhance Poland to overcome its crisis. More normal trade and economic co-operation with Poland, for which the Allies wish, could be effective if progress were made towards national reconciliation without which there can be no genuine economic and social recovery. The Allies urge the Soviet Union to cease its pressure on Poland so as not to impede the efforts of the Polish people for national renewal and reform.

5. The Soviet Union's actions in Afghanistan also pose a major obstacle to the normal development of international relations. Intensified Soviet aggression there continues to meet with the determined resistance of the Afghan people. The mounting toll of civilian casualties and destruction emphasises the urgency of a political solution based on the verifiable application of the resolutions of the United Nations General Assembly which called for the immediate withdrawal of Soviet forces, the restoration of Afghanistan's independence, sovereignty and non-aligned status, the right of the Afghan people to self-determination, and the voluntary return of refugees.

6. Defence and arms control are integral parts of the security policy of the Alliance. In pursuit of this policy the Allies have submitted a comprehensive series of proposals designed to lead to equitable, verifiable and militarily significant agreements for major reductions to a stable balance of forces at the lowest possible levels.

[39] Reference is to the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, signed in Helsinki, August 1, 1975.

7. In this spirit, the Allies concerned underline the continued importance of the decision of 12th December, 1979, which combined the modernization of United States longer range INF (LRINF) with a parallel offer of negotiations and the unilateral withdrawal from Europe of a thousand United States nuclear warheads; which was completed in 1980. Since that decision was taken, the Soviet Union has relentlessly continued its deployment of modern SS-20 missiles, greatly expanding its monopoly in this class of weapons which has created an entirely new threat for Europe. Ignoring the concerns of countries threatened by these systems, the Soviet Union is, at the same time, resisting achievement of an equitable negotiated solution. The Soviet approach would undermine the vital link between the defence of Europe and the American strategic deterrent. Present Soviet proposals would include third country national deterrent forces which have no place in the negotiations and leave the Soviets with more SS-20 missiles than when the negotiations began, deny the right to modernise the deterrent to this threat, leave unrestrained large Soviet SS-20 forces in the Eastern USSR which threaten Europe as well as Asia, and remove from Europe aircraft of the United States which are essential to conventional defence.

The Allies concerned reaffirm that in the absence of concrete negotiating results which obviate deployments, deployments will begin at the end of 1983, in accordance with the schedule established in the decision of 1979. At the same time these Allies remain fully committed to reaching a successful outcome in the INF negotiations, which they continue to monitor and evaluate closely. They will support continued negotiations even after initial deployments. These Allies will examine NATO's LRINF requirements when concrete results are achieved in the negotiations, and will make appropriate adjustments in the levels of deployments already decided in 1979. They fully support the efforts of the United States, in close consultation with them, to achieve progress in Geneva. These Allies strongly prefer the elimination of all United States and Soviet LRINF missiles, as proposed by the United States. They welcome and support as a further effort to achieve progress toward that end the United States proposal for an interim agreement which would result in equal global ceilings on warheads on United States and Soviet land-based LRINF missile systems at the lowest possible level. This proposal which establishes a flexible framework for negotiations was developed through close consultation among the Allies concerned. They call on the Soviet Union to contribute constructively to a successful outcome of the negotiations which addresses the legitimate security concerns of both sides and welcome current United States efforts to that end. They strongly hope a balanced agreement will be rapidly reached. [40]

8. Allies expressed their full support for the effort of the United States to negotiate reductions in United States and Soviet strategic arms, and to secure an agreement which will enhance strategic stability. They welcome new steps being taken by the United States to promote progress in the START negotiations, and called upon the Soviet Union to respond in a similarly positive spirit.

9. The Allies participating in the Mutual and Balanced Force Reductions (MBFR) talks attach great importance to achieving progress. They consider that the comprehensive approach embodied in their draft Treaty text of July 1982 provides the basis of an accord which would lead to parity at the agreed collective ceilings for combined ground and air force manpower in Central Europe through substantial staged reductions. This major initiative met what had been represented by the East as a fundamental requirement.' It also proposed a well defined and practical programme for implementing an agreement with the East. Western participants hope that the East will respond in a more constructive way and recognise that, in order to contribute to stability and security in Europe, an MBFR agreement must provide for reductions and limitations based on agreed data and for effective Associated Measures on verification and confidence-building.

10. In the committee on Disarmament the Allies seek disarmament measures which are balanced, realistic and verifiable, and which would maintain or enhance global security. In particular, they are working for an agreement on the prohibition of the development, production and stockpiling of chemical weapons and on the destruction of all existing stocks as well as the means of production. The Allies call upon the Soviet Union to cooperate in developing effective inspection and verification measures leading to agreements for the elimination of this entire category of weapons.

The Allies remain gravely concerned about strong evidence of continued use of chemical weapons in South East Asia and Afghanistan in violation of international law and of Soviet involvement in the use of such weapons. [41] They welcome procedures being developed by the United Nations to investigate allegations of the use of chemical weapons.

11. The Allies are continuing their efforts at the Madrid CSCE Follow-up meeting to arrive at a substantial and balanced concluding document, including a precise negotiating mandate for the Conference on Confidence and Security Building Measures and Disarmament in Europe. They consider that, as a result of the latest proposal by the neutral and non-aligned states, an agreement is now within reach which could permit a successful and early conclusion.

The Allies have already stated their willingness to accept the draft concluding document submitted by the neutral and non-aligned states, subject to limited and reasonable amendments favourably received by other participants and designed to enhance the balance of the agreement. The Allies therefore urge the Soviet Union to change its attitude and negotiate a solution of the few remaining issues. This would demonstrate that the Soviet Union shares the interest shown by other participating countries in a successful outcome to the Madrid meeting which will consolidate the CSCE process. The Allies are convinced that a substantial and balanced concluding document, together with renewed efforts to give full effect to the Final Act through concrete action, would be of particular importance for developing a more constructive East–West relationship.

The Allies emphasise the importance, in the present circumstances, not only of a reaffirmation of the 1975 Helsinki commitments as a whole, but also of an expression of the determination of the thirty-five signatory states to carry them out. They reaffirm, too, the importance they attach to the convening of a Conference which, as an integral part of the CSCE process, would have as its purpose the adoption of verifiable, militarily significant and binding provisions applicable to the whole of Europe. The Allies also remain committed to further progress in the important humanitarian aspects of East–West relations.

12. The Allies support confidence-building measures designed to promote greater openness about armed forces and military activities, overcome misapprehension and distrust and thus facilitate disarmament negotiations. The Allies recall that in 1982 the United Nations General Assembly reaffirmed the importance of confidence-building measures and invited all states to consider the introduction of such measures in their region. The Allies have taken a number of concrete initiatives in that direction. Proposals put forward by the Soviet Union, in contrast, are often declaratory. The United States government, in an effort to help develop a stable peace, has tabled a series of confidence-building measures in the START and INF negotiations and has suggested new proposals in the nuclear field and in mutual communications between the United States and the Soviet Union. The Allies will, in the context of the Conference on Disarmament in Europe, put forward concrete proposals for a new generation of confidence and security building measures in Europe. The Allies will continue their efforts to build confidence through improved verification procedures, the provision of clear and comparable data on defence spending and other steps likely to remove misconceptions. They urge the Soviet Union to join them in this endeavour.

13. The maintenance of a calm situation in and around Berlin and the strict observance and full implementation of the Quadripartite Agreement of 3rd September, 1971, including unimpeded traffic on the access routes, remain of fundamental importance for East–West relations.

Recalling their Rome statement of 5th May, 1981, [42] the Allies express the hope that the efforts of the Federal Republic of Germany towards further practical progress in inner-German relations and towards improvements for travel in both directions will bring direct benefits for Berlin and the German people in both states.

14. The Allies reiterate their abhorrence and condemnation of recurring terrorist acts which menace democratic institutions as well as the conduct of international relations. The Allies reaffirm their determination to pursue all necessary efforts to combat and suppress crimes of terrorism.

15. The Ministers note that since their last meeting several aspects of East-West economic relations have been studied including the security implications of these relations. Trade conducted on the basis of commercially sound terms and mutual advantage, that avoids preferential treatment of the Soviet Union, contributes to constructive East-West relations. At the same time, bilateral economic relations with the Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe must remain consistent with broad Allied security concerns. These include avoiding dependence on the Soviet Union, or contributing to Soviet military capabilities. Thus, development of Western energy resources should be encouraged. In order to avoid further use by the Soviet Union of some forms of trade to enhance its military strength, the Allies will remain vigilant in their continuing review of the security aspects of East-West economic relations. This work will assist Allied governments in the conduct of their policies in this field. [43]

16. Sustained economic recovery in the West is essential since the strength and security of the member countries rest upon social stability and progress as well as upon defence preparedness. In accordance with Article 2 of the North Atlantic Treaty the Allies will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration among them. The Allies reaffirm the importance of this commitment and of support from programmes which are intended to benefit the economies of less favoured partners.

17. The Allies will continue to work for the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations and will promote conditions of stability and well-being. The aid which they give bilaterally and multilaterally is an important contribution to this end. Countries in the Third World should have the freedom to develop politically, economically and socially without outside interference. The Allies urge respect for sovereignty and genuine non-alignment.

The Allies recognise that events outside the Treaty area may affect their common interests as members of the Alliance. If it is established that their common interests are involved, they will engage in timely consultations. Sufficient military capabilities must be assured in the Treaty area to maintain an adequate defence posture. Individual member governments who are in a position to do so will endeavour to support, at their request, sovereign nations whose security and independence are threatened. Those Allies in a position to facilitate the deployment of forces outside the Treaty area may do so on the basis of national decision.

The Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs informed the North Atlantic Council of the present state of the review that the Spanish Government has undertaken regarding its participation in the Alliance, pending which he reserved his Government's position on the present Communiqué.

At the same time, however, the Spanish Minister expressed that his Government shares in the Communiqué in so far as it reflects positions already expressed by Spain in her relations with the member countries of the Alliance.

The Danish Minister of Foreign Affairs repeated Danish Government support for the double-track decision but at the same time he presented to his colleagues the motion passed by the Folketing on 26th May.

[43] Greece recalled its position on various aspects of this paragraph. [Footnote in the source text.]

Transcript of a Press Briefing by the Secretary of State (Shultz), June 10, 1983 (Extract) [44]

Assessment of the NATO Ministerial Meeting

. . . . . .

Q. Sir, how would you characterize the results of this meeting from the U.S. point of view?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. I think we have had a series of meetings, as I've said, and the OECD meeting got this process off to a very good start. The Williamsburg summit, I think was outstanding. And from all I can judge, the NATO Defense Ministers meeting was very strong and this one was. We have been saying to ourselves for a long time, I know when I came back from Europe in December 1979, or December whenever it was 1982.

Q. Seems like such a long time.

SECRETARY SHULTZ. It seems like it, yes. I felt very strongly, and said that 1983 is a real big year. And from an economic standpoint, arms control standpoint, deployment standpoint, a lot of things, so we really have to concentrate and be sure things go well.

And I think they are. I think we have demonstrated time and again the strength of the alliance. The whole thing, of course, is helped a lot in the sense that expansion is taking place in the economy. So I think a long way round about answering your question is it was a good meeting and part of a pattern. No, it was right on the line. I suppose if anything coming over here, as I think I mentioned, we had to be careful having had these three meetings, that you don't sort of have a sense of anticlimax. I think somebody here asked about that or maybe it was in that session in Paris, and that is a problem. But I think it carried itself on through, it was very good.

Q. Mr. Secretary, one of the major issues that has been the highlight of this meeting is the INF question. Can you give us your assessment now of the prospects for agreement? I know you have said it is up to the Russians. But is an agreement possible this year? And if one isn't reached when do those deployments start? Can you give us a little more specificity there?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. As far as the deployments are concerned, there is a schedule and a plan. And it involves obviously preparatory work which is going on as you get sights [sites] ready and all of that. And then a schedule of deployment, I can't call off [recall] the precise dates, come toward the end of the year. But that's all scheduled and there has been a very clear determination all along that we are going to hold to that schedule. So there is no ambiguity about that whatever.

Of course an arms control agreement is possible. Whether it is likely or will happen, I think depends primarily on whether the Soviet Union wants to come and talk about in terms of, at least our standpoint, are reasonable [sic].

Q. To what extent do you think the reservations that the Greeks and the Danes expressed again at this meeting, does that in effect take a bit of the glow off the meeting, or does it in a way tarnish the work that has been done?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, the Greeks have a habit of reserving on things and that has become sort of a standard thing. So, it is something that always happens and it is kind of interesting that Haralambopoulos, who I don't know whether you know him or interviewed him or anything. He's quite a delightful person. He's fun. And he has lots to say and he always makes these speeches about—well here is this paragraph and I'm reserving it because I don't agree with all the essential points but there is this or there is that and so on and I think by this time people have accommodated themselves to it and can go along.

The Danish reservation is a problem and that vote is a problem. At the same time the Danish Government itself does not share the view expressed in that vote. And they've been very clear about that. I hope that as time goes on the Danish situation will mend itself. But certainly that is not something that we are looking for.

Q. There seems to be a very conscious effort to put the onus on the Soviet Union on arms control. In your statements in the report that was issued in the SCG statement and so forth, I wonder do you think that you are having any success in getting that message across to the West European public and to the American public that indeed the Russians are to blame for the fact that there hasn't been any agreement?

SECRETARY SHULTZ. Well, I think that we need to keep saying what it is true. I don't know how to come up with a measure of what you say or your question, but I suppose the best measures are elections. And the candidates that stood up to these issues very strongly won decisively. So I think that is probably the best answer you can get of where the political thrust is.

Address by the Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs (Wallis) Before the American Society of Business Press Editors, Chicago, June 20, 1983 [45]

A Collective Approach to East-West Economic Relations

My talk this morning is concerned with the effort that the United States and its Japanese, Canadian, and European partners are making to fashion a collective approach to their economic relations with the Soviet Union. As you know, this is a particularly difficult undertaking. The problems lie in the nature of the Soviet system, in the events of the last dozen or so years, and in various economic and geographic differences among the United States and its partners. Nevertheless, the undertaking is succeeding with important concrete and durable results to show for our common efforts.

I will describe some of these results in a few moments, but first I will review briefly how we got where we are and why this process is such a difficult, but at the same time important, undertaking.

In mid-1983, it is difficult to recall how warm, even euphoric, the atmosphere of East-West relations was in 1972, the heyday of détente. The Soviet Union and the United States had just signed a strategic arms limitation agreement, perceived at the time as an important milestone in limiting arms expenditures and as the prime indicator of relaxation in Soviet-American relations. President Nixon and Premier Brezhnev exchanged visits and signed numerous agreements. Allies on both sides joined in to create a widespread spirit of East-West détente.

Economic relations, naturally, played a major part in the new atmosphere. The West liberalized its credit terms, and the Soviets took advantage of this liberalization to increase their purchases of Western grain and of technology and equipment that they could make only with difficulty or not at all. Truck assembly lines, entire chemical plants and innumerable pieces of capital equipment were purchased by the Soviets. Both sides experienced economic and political benefits from the increased level of trade.

The theory underlying détente was that a web of economic, scientific, cultural, and political relationships would so interlink Soviet and Western societies that their views on security and other core issues would tend to converge. It was believed that the tangible benefits flowing from economic and other interchanges would encourage Soviet restraint in foreign policy.

In forging economic links with the Soviets, the United States was as eager as any nation to increase the level of its commerce. From 1972 to 1975, U.S. trade with the Eastern bloc nearly tripled. The Pullman Corporation helped the Soviets to set up production lines at the Kama River truck plant, and the Bryant Manufacturing Company sold the Soviets equipment that allowed it to make miniature ball bearings of extreme precision.

We all know how the hopeful views of East-West relations spawned early in the decade soured at the end of the decade, especially after 1979. Détente, with its web of relationships and incontestible economic benefits to Soviet society, was no barrier at all when Soviet decisionmakers saw opportunities to advance their strategic position through overseas adventurism or outright military aggression. Anyone who had illusions that fundamental Soviet views had changed during détente was quickly disabused of those notions.

It is a familiar litany to describe how the Soviets, in the late 1970s and after, failed to live up to the hopes of a decade earlier. Their sponsorship of Cuban adventures in Africa, their continuing activities in Indochina, their invasion of Afghanistan, their crackdown in Poland, and their involvement in Central America were visible indications that their fundamental values and policies had not been changed at all by a more lenient, friendly, and cooperative attitude on the part of the West. Underlying these aggressive acts, of course, was the massive and unrelenting Soviet military buildup that went far beyond any reasonable notion of what would be needed to defend the U.S.S.R. Even in the area of strategic arms, supposedly restrained by the SALT agreement, the Soviets continued the most massive buildup in all history.

As the Soviets demonstrated that their fundamental values and policies had not changed, Western governments began to reevaluate their economic, political, and security relationships with the East. Attitudes changed quickly in the United States. A pivotal point was our refusal in 1979 to ratify the SALT II Treaty. That has been followed by strenuous efforts to increase our defenses against the Soviet threat. Our allies and partners also concluded, in the various and wondrous ways by which democratic nations reach decisions, that the relaxed policies of a decade earlier were no longer appropriate—perhaps never had been. Soviet behavior made it obviously dangerous to conduct economic relations with the Soviets in ways that underwrite and enhance military capabilities. The danger was underscored by direct use by the Soviets of equipment from the West to manufacture items for their military. The ship that had embarked so hopefully upon the seas of détente obviously had to come about and chart a new course.

In the economic area, it was hardly a surprise that U.S. attitudes changed more rapidly than those of our European and Japanese partners. European and Japanese trade with the East has always been much more extensive than that of the United States, even before the Russian revolution of 1917. There is a natural complementarity of trade between Eastern raw materials and Western manufactured goods. This factor, combined with geographic proximity, means that East–West trade is much more important to Europeans and Japanese than to Americans.

As Western views changed, differences in the pace with which individual governments reevaluated their positions on East–West economic relations created noticeable tensions within the alliance. Such tensions are, of course, a fact of life in relations among democratic states. It is the job of statesmen to resolve the differences and preserve the fundamental community of values among their respective nations.

It is interesting to trace this change in attitudes, to see how difficult it can be to change course on a major policy question. In announcing his candidacy for president, Ronald Reagan said:

> "On the foreign front, the decade of the 1980s will place severe pressures upon the United States and its allies. We can expect to be tested in ways calculated to try our patience, to confound our resolve, and to erode our belief in ourselves.
> "For the most of the last 40 years, we have been preoccupied with the global struggle—the competition with the Soviet Union and with our responsibilities to our allies. But too often in recent times we have just drifted along with events, responding as if we thought of ourselves as a nation in decline.
> "It is now time to take stock of our own house and to resupply its strength."

Our process started within the government with a thorough analysis of East–West economic relations, and the work with the allies began in earnest at the Ottawa economic summit in July 1981. The leaders at Ottawa made a significant statement about East–West relations:

> "We concluded that consultations and, where appropriate, coordination are necessary to ensure that, in the field of East–West relations, our economic policies continue to be compatible with our political and security objectives." [46]

[46] See footnote 11 above.

READEX FICHE

During the following year, leading up to the summit at Versailles, we worked with our summit partners on a number of specific issues—principally on the problem of European vulnerability to disruption of Soviet gas exports. At Versailles, the leaders again adopted a statement on East-West economic issues, but it was clear that the analyses of the issues by the leaders were different enough to create problems in interpretation and implementation.

Last summer, when Secretary Shultz entered office, he was asked by the President to listen carefully to what our allies and friends were saying. George Shultz is an able and experienced negotiator who appreciates the value of listening. As he listened, he recognized two fundamental facts. First, that there was enough convergence in the views that he heard to give a good chance of reaching agreement on a collective approach to East-West economic relations and, second, that a collective approach would be much more effective than a unilateral approach.

On Secretary Shultz's recommendation, President Reagan last November lifted the restrictions imposed 5 months earlier on the sale of oil and gas equipment to the Soviet Union. In taking this action, the President emphasized that the United States and its European, Japanese, and Canadian partners had agreed to undertake a series of analyses of East-West economic relations designed to provide a framework for a collective approach to these relations. The analyses were undertaken immediately in a variety of locations. It is the results of those analyses that are the core of my message today.

In the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, East-West financial relations and credit terms were examined. Special attention was given to problems stemming from Eastern nations' centralized control of trade. A continuous review of a broad spectrum of problems in East-West economic relations was started.

The International Energy Agency analyzed the dangers created by undue energy dependence, and it considered alternative sources of energy.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization examined the overall security implications of East-West economic relations.

The Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Security Export Controls (COCOM) studied ways of improving surveillance and control over Western exports that have strategic or military implications.

While some work is continuing in each of these organizations, major segments of the analyses that were started last November have now been completed. The results achieved thus far provide a basic framework that has been agreed upon by the United States and its partners for the conduct of East-West economic relations. The hopes of President Reagan and Secretary Shultz in undertaking the analyses have been borne out amply by the positive and constructive spirit in which they were conducted and by the results that have been achieved. In fact, the conclusions based on those analyses that had been agreed to before the 1983 summit meeting of industrialized countries made it unnecessary for the seven heads of government to spend much time at Williamsburg on this subject. In the Williamsburg declaration the heads of state and government said:

> "East-West economic relations should be compatible with our security interests. We take note with approval of the work of the multilateral organizations which have in recent months analyzed and drawn conclusions regarding the key aspects of East-West economic relations. We encourage continuing work by these organizations, as appropriate." [47]

Let me review for you some of the major points on which the leaders based that statement.

First, they recognize that the Soviets use some forms of trade to enhance their military capabilities and that, as a result, we must be vigilant to ensure that economic relations are consistent with our common security interests. While some forms of trade that are conducted on commercially sound terms can benefit both sides, we must insist on a balance of advantages and avoid preferential treatment of the Soviets.

Second, in regard to energy, the United States and its partners recognize that natural gas, with its relatively inflexible supply system, poses particular security problems. We have agreed that, in meeting future gas needs, we will take concrete steps to ensure that no one producer is in a position to exercise monopoly power over industrial countries. Further, we are also acting to encourage the production of natural gas from Norwegian and North American sources, and each nation is improving its safety-net measures in order to be able to deal with any interruptions of supply. The United States and its partners have agreed also to conduct regular reviews of each country's energy policy, giving special attention to dependencies and alternative sources of supply. We believe that these concrete accomplishments will enhance Western energy security and make it more difficult for the Soviets to use its abundant energy resources to extract political gains.

[47] The quotation is from the joint statement issued by the Heads of Government at the Williamsburg Economic Summit Conference, May 28–30, 1983; see document 79.

Third, we reached agreement that it is not sensible to continue to give the Soviets the same reductions on interest rates given to newly industrialized countries to finance their imports. Our agreed minimum interest rate for official lending to rich countries, including the Soviets is now 12.4 percent, nearly two points above the current U.S. prime rate. Also in the area of credits, we are working to improve our ability to monitor credit flows, so that our data on foreign indebtedness will be accurate and up to date.

Finally, in coordinating controls over the export of strategic technology, we are united with our allies in declaring that economic relations should not be permitted to contribute to Soviet military capabilities. At an April high-level meeting with our COCOM partners we explored ways in which the multilateral system of controls could be strengthened. The proceedings of the meeting are confidential, but I can say that the United States is well pleased with the work on improving coordination in export licensing and in the enforcement of controls. We are confident that the results of the COCOM work will reduce the flow of high technology to the East.

As you are aware, none of the organizations within which these analyses were performed (IEA, OECD, NATO, and COCOM), is a supranational body whose recommendations are binding on member states. Indeed, such a rigid arrangement would be antithetical to the spirit of our alliances and friendships with other democratic countries. Instead, the countries with which we have collaborated in these analyses have agreed with us concerning the validity, relevance, and importance of the findings; and they have agreed to take the conclusions strongly into account as they formulate their own national policies. We are confident that the results that have been achieved through this collective approach to East–West economic issues will yield valuable benefits for Western security.

I mentioned earlier that some aspects of the studies are continuing. We are seeking to build on the results that have been achieved thus far and heighten awareness of the security dimension of East–West economic relations. We are starting a process that will examine East–West economic relations as they develop and will provide informed analyses for the use of policymakers. Specific efforts that are in process now include:

An effort in COCOM to strengthen that organization and examine whether members' security interests require controls on additional high technology items;

Continuing work within NATO on the security implications of East–West economic relations;

An analysis in OECD of the balance of economic advantages in East–West trade; and

The ongoing study I mentioned earlier of national energy policies and Western energy security.

Before I conclude, let me restate our position on East–West economic relations and say why we think this area is so important. First, let me emphasize categorically that we are not waging economic warfare against the Soviet Union. We do not seek to cause the "collapse" of their economy. In fact, we would not want that—that would be a dangerous development. We favor mutually beneficial economic relations where those relations are conducted on commercial terms and where the advantages are mutual and balanced. An example of mutually beneficial trade is agriculture, where a U.S. team is at this moment in Moscow negotiating a new long-term agreement for grain sales to the Soviets.

We must keep in mind, however, that the Soviets vigorously seek to use trade with the West to enhance their strategic position and that they choose to devote 15 percent of their gross national product to the military—a level far beyond what can possibly be regarded as "defense." They have also not acted as a responsible and restrained member of the international order. As Secretary Shultz put it last week in his statement to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, unconstructive Soviet behavior has needlessly drawn more and more international problems into the East-West rivalry and made the task of managing our relationship more difficult. In the light of this, the United States and its partners have agreed to conduct their economic relations with the Soviets in a way that does not give preferential treatment to the Soviets or benefit their military position. It is crucial that we not permit our economic relations with the Soviets to be used in ways that reduce Western security.

To summarize, let me again state that the process of turning away from the economics of détente has been a long and reluctant one for the United States and its friends and allies. Differences of perception within the alliance and variations in the pace at which views have evolved sometimes have made the path rocky. Yet, through patient and statesmanlike determination, a collective approach to East-West economic relations has been forged.

We are confident that this collective approach has strengthened our common security, just as President Reagan said in his radio address last November 13 that it would. It has provided a sound basis for Western economic policy toward the East for the rest of the decade and beyond. Perhaps this approach can reduce, at least modestly, the amounts that we must spend each year to defend the values and liberties that we and our partners hold dear.

U.S. Sincerity on Nuclear Arms Reduction

Our basic agreement on fundamental issues is not always clearly recognized. While my conversations with the leaders I have visited so far have revealed many points of agreement, I have found during this visit to Northern Europe, and especially in talking with the press, that key aspects of American foreign policy are sometimes misunderstood.

The responsibility for explaining American Foreign policy of course belongs to the United States, and I welcome this opportunity to dispel certain misconceptions—I call them myths—about what President Reagan is trying to accomplish.

The first such myth holds that President Reagan is insincere about seeking nuclear arms reductions. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The President's record speaks for itself. In the last 2 years, the Reagan administration—working with Denmark and other close allies—has come forward with new and far-reaching proposals:

—to eliminate intermediate-range nuclear forces;

—to reduce substantially intercontinental strategic forces;

—to reduce troop levels in Europe to equal levels; and —to ban completely the production and stockpiling of all chemical weapons.

[48] Source: Press Release, July 4, 1983, Office of the Press Secretary to the Vice President; printed also in Department of State Bulletin, September, 1983, pp. 11–14. Bush was on a 2-week trip to Northern Europe where, between June 23 and July 27, 1983, he visited the United Kingdom, the Federal Republic of Germany, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Denmark (July 3–4), Ireland, and Iceland. Omitted from the Vice President's speech here are his remarks on Central America.

In negotiation after negotiation, we have demonstrated our flexibility. In the INF negotiations, for example, the President announced last spring that if the Soviet Union refused to eliminate an entire class of INF missiles, the United States would be willing instead to enter into an interim agreement providing for lower levels of INF warheads.

More recently, the President has demonstrated his flexibility in strategic arms reductions by announcing that if the Soviet Union rejected the original American proposal for cuts in ballistic missiles, the United States would be willing to discuss a different limit.

Now I know some people argue that this is all just a public relations ploy and that the President isn't really interested in achieving agreement. This is simply untrue. I know the President well, and I know his innermost feelings on this matter. President Reagan is a man deeply committed to arms reductions—a man with a vision of a world free from the burden of the nuclear threat.

The President demonstrated his sincerity again just last week when the United States announced that it would support the effort of the Spanish government to find a compromise agreement at the Madrid meeting on Security and Cooperation in Europe. We are encouraged by what appears to be a favorable Soviet response to this effort and we hope that the Spanish initiative soon produces an outcome that will enhance the prospects for both disarmament and the observance of human rights in Europe.

. . . . . .

Returning to Europe, another myth considers it is longstanding American policy to seek not arms control, but an unconstrained nuclear arms race. Yet once again, the record speaks for itself.

The United States has always stood at the very forefront of arms control. It was an American, Bernard Baruch, who in the aftermath of World War II, before the Soviets even had nuclear weapons, proposed that all countries relinquish to the United Nations their right to deploy nuclear weapons. The Soviet Union rejected that proposal.

It was an American, President Dwight Eisenhower, who came forward with the "Open Skies" proposal designed to lower tensions by giving both sides the ability to observe each other's military programs with reconnaissance aircraft. The Soviet Union rejected that proposal.

It was an American, President Ronald Reagan, taking the moral high ground, who called for the total elimination of an entire class of INF missiles. Again, the Soviet Union rejected that proposal.

The United States adamantly opposes an arms race. Despite all the talk you hear of weapons piling up, the fact is that the United States has fewer nuclear weapons in its stockpile today than it did 15 years ago. And the total destructive power of those warheads is lower than at any point in the last 25 years.

In a decision, moreover, that received surprisingly little attention or credit, the United States over the last 3 years unilaterally withdrew 1,000 nuclear weapons from Europe. And if we are forced to deploy INF missiles, we have agreed with our allies that for every new warhead that is set in place, an existing nuclear warhead will be withdrawn.

In the interests of arms reductions, we are willing to consider every option. We have not ruled out a summit meeting with the Soviet Union. For such a meeting to succeed, however, it must be thoroughly prepared, and President Reagan has made it clear that he will insist on such preparation. We owe too much to the American people—to the people of the world—not to do our best to ensure that a summit produces not frustrated hopes, but substantive results.

I did not come to Northern Europe to engage in confrontation, but I believe we would do well to pose certain questions to the Soviets.

—Why did the Soviet Union, with no warning, begin its buildup of SS–20's in the mid-1970's?

—Why did the Soviet Union, after NATO's December 1979 decision, continue its SS–20 buildup when Soviet leaders themselves openly proclaimed that a balance already existed in Europe?

—And why, even after Moscow announced last year that there would be a moratorium on deployment, did the Soviet Union nevertheless deploy even larger numbers of SS-20's?

These questions bear directly on the lives of hundreds of millions of free men and women. The people of the West deserve answers.

A final myth holds that the United States is planning to fight a limited nuclear war in Europe. This is the most pernicious myth of all.

It is not now and never has been American policy to fight a nuclear war or to try to limit any East/West conflict to Europe. Indeed, the whole NATO strategy of deterrence has been designed to make it absolutely unmistakable to any potential aggressor that, in the words of NATO doctrine, an attack on one is an attack on all. It is the very essence of deterrence that the prospect of American retaliation against an attack on Europe lowers the incentive for such aggression.

We have no illusions about the terrible consequences of nuclear war. President Reagan has repeatedly stated that in a nuclear war, there can be no winners, only losers. And it is because we suffer no illusions that we stand utterly determined to do whatever we must to prevent a nuclear cataclysm.

When we recognize these myths for what they are, there is good reason for optimism about the prospects for freedom and peace. President Reagan's commitment to the achievement of significant arms reduction is, as I stated, unshakable. And because of his realistic assessment of Soviet intentions and his determination to keep the United States strong, in my judgment, President Reagan has a better chance than any recent American President of negotiating major arms reductions.

There is another good reason for optimism, and that is the record of the NATO alliance. In the more than 3 decades since the formation of the alliance, over 100 wars have taken place in the world. Yet under NATO's protection, Western Europe, part of a continent that for all its history had known outbreak after outbreak of battle and that had undergone the awful carnages of the first half of this century, has nevertheless experienced peace.

I want to close by saying a word to the young people of Western Europe—those who are too young, maybe, to remember anything at all about the Second World War. Like many of your parents and grandparents, I lived through that war—fought in it as a pilot in the Pacific, got shot down once, saw some of my best friends killed before my eyes.

I want you to know that I understand your love of peace, because to those of us who lived through that war, these past thirty-some years of peace have been more precious than words can tell. And because I have children—and grandchildren—and I don't want them ever to have to go through what I and so very many others went through.

You must believe us when we tell you that peace doesn't just happen, it has to be built, and then protected. I know that many of you belong to peace movements, and I admire your idealism, but I would like you to realize that one organization, the NATO Alliance, has successfully kept the peace for these three and more decades. This alliance of free nations represents the true European peace movement. We are joined not just by security, but by our fundamental commitment to democratic values—by our fundamental commitment to freedom.

The alliance does, of course, impose its responsibilities. Some nations, the United States among them, have had to station troops far from home; others in turn have had to live with foreign troops on their soil. All our nations have had to spend more on defense and keep more men in uniform than we like to do in peacetime. All our people have had to live with the pressures and tensions involved in maintaining our freedom in a turbulent world.

Yet beyond the Elbe millions bear burdens far heavier than our own. We speak out at will. Andrei Sakharov, Anatoly Scharansky, and Lech Walesa know no such freedom. We travel from country to country as we choose. Those behind the Berlin Wall know no such liberty. During this visit I have encountered some protests. Who among us would not thrill at the sight of an anti-nuclear demonstration in Red Square?

But the Soviets have shown us how they treat freedom. East Germany, 1953. Hungary, 1956. Czechoslovakia, 1968. Afghanistan, 1979. Poland, Today.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident," Thomas Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

For more than three decades the people of Western Europe and North America have enjoyed the exercise of their self-evident rights in peace. I am confident that if the NATO Alliance keeps the support not only of those of us who have known war, but of those of you we pray never shall, then we will continue to defend those rights, and to keep that peace.

Endorsement of Concluding Document of Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe

After nearly 3 years of negotiation, the 35 states participating in the Madrid review meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe [50] are approaching agreement on a concluding document [51]—one that will strengthen and extend the undertakings contained in the Helsinki Final Act. It is a call on all 35 CSCE states—particularly those who have so tragically failed to live up to promises made in Helsinki—to give life to these commitments and to rededicate themselves to advancing the freedom and justice on which security in Europe ultimately depends.

We have agreed to this concluding document, as we did in 1975 to the Helsinki Final Act itself, with no illusions about the nature of the Soviet Union or about the system which it seeks to impose over much of Europe. In an ideal world, agreements such as this would not be necessary. But we believe it is the best agreement attainable, one which significantly improves on the Helsinki Final Act and advances the efforts of the West to hold out a beacon of hope for those in the East who seek a more free, just and secure life

Together with the Helsinki Accord, this agreement sets forth a clearer code of conduct for all 35 CSCE states—a set of standards to which we and the other Atlantic democracies will continue to hold all those who will have pledged their word at Madrid. We will sign it with the hope that it will serve as a step toward achieving our objective of a more stable and constructive relationship with the Soviet Union.

The Madrid Accord will add important new commitments to the Helsinki process, including provisions dealing with human rights, the trade union freedoms so tragically violated in Poland, terrorism, religious liberties, reunification of families, free flow of information, and more. It will provide for two important meetings of experts in the humanitarian field, and for a security conference which will attempt to negotiate measures for reducing the danger of surprise attack in Europe. Another full followup meeting will take place in Vienna in 1986, where we will review the conduct of the participating states and seek to build on the accomplishments at Madrid.

The unity and resolve of the Western democracies at Madrid have made this achievement possible. Ambassador Kampelman and his NATO colleagues deserve the highest praise for bringing this long and often difficult conference to a successful conclusion. We also owe a special vote of thanks to Prime Minister Gonzalez of Spain, whose thoughtful proposal set the stage for final agreement.

In concluding the Madrid meeting, we reaffirm our commitment to the Helsinki process. We will not flag in our continued determination to work with all governments and peoples whose goal is the strengthening of peace in freedom. As Madrid has shown, dialog, when based on realistic expectations and conducted with patience, can produce results. These results are often gradual and hard-won, but they are the necessary building blocks for a more secure and stable world. The challenge remains; we must all consolidate and build on these gains; we must ensure that good words are transformed into good deeds and that the ideals which they embody are given concrete expression. Giving substance to the promises of Madrid and Helsinki will remain one of our prime objectives.

Progress at the CSCE Review Meeting

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

The 35 states participating in the Madrid CSCE review conference, after almost 3 years of negotiation, are approaching agreement on a final document. This conclusion meets the Western criteria for an acceptable, balanced, and substantive result. It confirms and expands upon the original Helsinki Final Act of 1975. The United States is pleased at the result and believes that the 2 years and 10 months spent negotiating in Madrid have been fruitful and well worth the extraordinary effort.

There follows a summary followed by an outline of the issues that have dominated the Madrid meeting, as well as a report on how the final document deals with those issues.

The Madrid concluding document will add important new provisions to the Helsinki Final Act of 1975. These provisions deal with the rights of workers to organize, with human rights, with Helsinki monitors, religious rights, human contacts and family reunification, access to diplomatic and consular missions, information, rights of journalists, and measures against terrorism.

It also provides for convening a Conference on Security and Confidence Building Measures and Disarmament in Stockholm next year to work out detailed measures to reduce the fear of surprise military attack. An important new element in this decision is that the measures to be adopted at Stockholm will apply to all of the European portion of the Soviet Union, right up to the Ural Mountains, rather than only to the 250-kilometer (150-mile) band provided for in the Helsinki Final Act.

In addition, the Madrid agreement schedules a series of additional meetings which are to take place over the next 3 years. There will be meetings on human rights, human contacts, and on the peaceful settlement of disputes, a cultural forum and a seminar on economic, scientific, and cultural cooperation in the Mediterranean. A meeting is also scheduled in Helsinki during 1985 to mark the 10th anniversary of the Helsinki Final Act.

Finally, the Madrid Conference will agree to convene the next followup meeting in Vienna in November 1986 in order to carry forward the review process begun in Belgrade in 1977–78 and continued in Madrid over the past 2 years and 10 months.

One of the most important aspects of the CSCE process is the opportunity it provides for a thorough review of the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act. During this review in Madrid, there was general condemnation of the failure of the East European states to live up to their Helsinki commitments, with special criticism of the Soviet and Polish Governments for their policies of internal repression and, in the case of the USSR, its interference in the internal affairs of Poland and Afghanistan.

The establishment by the Madrid concluding document of a whole series of supplementary meetings will ensure that this critical attention to the behavior of the Soviet Union and other Eastern European governments will continue during the next 3 1/2 years. Those experts' meetings, and the Vienna followup conference, will ensure that any state's failure to live up to the undertakings made in Madrid and in Helsinki will again attract the full spotlight of public attention.

Implementation Review

The Madrid Preparatory Meeting, which began on September 9, 1980 and did not end until after the main meeting opened on November 11, 1980, a period of more than 9 weeks, focused on Western demands that discussions of new proposals on how best to strengthen the Helsinki process should be preceded by a review of how the provisions of the Helsinki Final Act of 1975 were being implemented. The agenda finally produced by the Preparatory Meeting provided that opportunity. The period of November 11 to December 19, 1980 was set aside for that review, and it was a thorough one. The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the record of human rights violations in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe were explored and recorded in meticulous detail.

Continuing Soviet and other Eastern violations of the Helsinki Final Act made it necessary to extend this review of implementation throughout most of the Madrid deliberations.

The final document acknowledges that this review took place ("They . . . reaffirmed . . . the importance of the implementation of all the provisions . . . of the Final Act . . . as being . . . essential. . . . It was confirmed that the thorough exchange of views constitutes in itself a valuable contribution towards the achievement of the aims set by CSCE. In this context, it was agreed that those aims can only be attained by continuous implementation, unilaterally, bilaterally and multilaterally, of all the provisions and by respect for all the principles of the Final Act."), that the review is essential to the health of the process, and that there must be an improvement in compliance. ("Serious violations of a number of these principles were deplored during the assessments. Therefore, the participating states . . . considered it necessary to state . . . that strict application of and respect for these principles, in all their aspects, are essential for the improvement of mutual relations between the participating states . . . "). [53]

The United States is fully aware of the fact that the Helsinki Final Act cannot attain its objectives when certain states, particularly the USSR, continue to violate its provisions. There are no enforcement mechanisms under the Act. The Madrid meeting has been, therefore, the appropriate forum at which to insert political and moral pressure into the process. The implementation review became the mechanism. The fact that it was efficiently undertaken by a united Western group of states, joined by most of the neutral and nonaligned states, made that possible.

Equally important, Madrid's implementation review afforded the opportunity for a large number of the participating states to communicate to the Soviet Union their deep concerns about violations of the accords. The message was clear: "Conform to the promises made in 1975 if you wish to be recognized as a responsible member of the international community."

Even as the pattern of Helsinki Final Act violations by the East continued, the United States took note of certain specific acts responding to Western concerns. The decision by Romania on its education immigration tax is an illustration. The suspension of some aspects of martial law in Poland and the release of Lech Walesa is another, although continued arrests and imprisonment of thousands and the continued outlawing of Solidarity put the bona fides of those steps into question. We have also noted and welcomed a few gestures from the Soviet Union and will continue to encourage further such steps. We hope there will be other developments in response to our concerns.

Transcript of a Press Briefing by the Head of the U.S. Delegation to the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Force Negotiations (Nitze), July 21, 1983 (Extract) [54]

Negative Soviet Response to U.S. Interim INF Proposal

AMBASSADOR NITZE. Good afternoon. I've just had the opportunity once again to consult with the President and Judge Clark on the negotiations in Geneva, on the reduction and limitation of intermediate-range nuclear forces. During the last round that began in the middle of May and recessed a week ago, the U.S. delegation presented and explained in detail the text of a treaty which would implement the interim proposal which the President, after extensive consultation with our NATO allies, had authorized us to put forward.

That text called for equal number of warheads on the INF missiles of the United States and of the Soviet Union. We attempted to elicit from the Soviet delegation an indication of the level they would be interested in. They would not do so. In an effort to move the negotiations forward, we told them we would consider any level between zero and 572 and specifically proposed a level of 50 each on each side, a level of 100, 150, and so on up to 450.

The Soviet side continued to insist on their one-sided proposal, that they be permitted a continuing and large deployment of the SS-20's in Europe and that the United States not be permitted to deploy any comparable systems in Europe.

They also insisted on no limitations whatever on their forces in the eastern portion of the U.S.S.R. and on a significant reduction in the U.S. duel-capable air support of NATO's conventional defenses.

The negotiations in Geneva have been intense and strenuous, with movement on a number of issues but as yet not by the Soviet side on the most important issues. The President today repeated to me his deep desire for a constructive outcome if that is at all possible prior to the first U.S. deployments scheduled for later this year.

The President is impressed as am I by the steadfast support of our allies, both in Europe and in Asia. With that support and the support of the American people, I believe that the Soviet Union may yet see the wisdom of reaching a fair agreement and the folly of continuing to maintain a rigid and uncompromising attitude.

Q. Mr. Ambassador, you sound pretty bleak. What is it that gives you any hope that before December, before the start of the deployment, there could be an agreement?

AMBASSADOR NITZE. I'm not that bleak. Temperamentally, I'm an optimist. And this last round has been, as I said, a strenuous and difficult round, but I think we have made some progress. But it is my hope and belief that the Soviets will in this last round give real consideration to—

Q. Where does the—excuse me—where does the progress come from? I mean, where do you see it?

AMBASSADOR NITZE. We have changed our position radically. The President's interim proposal was a substantial change from the zero-zero proposal which we had had on the table prior to that time. In fact, one time it was referred to by the other side as "the boulder standing in the river of progress." So, we've done something on our side.

We've done other things on our side. I don't want to get into the details of the negotiation. But they also, with respect to the details, have made some movement. What I've said is, with respect to the central problems, there I'm hopeful that they will, in the next round—they didn't in this last round, make significant movement.

Address by the Secretary of State (Shultz) Before the Concluding Session of the Madrid CSCE Conference, Madrid, September 9, 1983 [55]

Concluding CSCE Document: Expansion and Improvement of the Helsinki Final Act

Spain, our gracious and creative host, has made a successful—and inspiring—transition to democracy. That success reminds us by its example that the light of freedom can never be extinguished and that the aspiration to human dignity is basic to all peoples. This is what the Helsinki process is all about. That is why the United States supports continuation of the process, strengthened as it is by what has been accomplished here at Madrid.

But we also meet at a time when basic human rights remain widely denied, and in the immediate aftermath of a brutal tragedy, shocking to the conscience of mankind. The Korean Airline massacre reminds us all of the extent to which the objectives of the CSCE process remain to be achieved. Our meeting here must therefore mark—as statement after statement of Ministers have done—renewed determination in the pursuit of these fundamental objectives.

Mr. Chairman, the Helsinki process was launched with great hopes 10 years ago. It was born at what seemed to be an encouraging moment in East-West relations: The United States and the Soviet Union had just reached the first agreements on strategic arms limitation. Broad vistas of economic cooperation appeared open. Progress seemed possible on human rights. There was an awareness that lasting peace required us to look at the totality of our relations. And so Helsinki was an attempt to deal comprehensively with the problems of security, economic relations, contacts between our peoples, their basic freedoms, and standards of international conduct.

The Helsinki Final Act is an eloquent statement of aspirations, to which the United States gladly subscribed because we subscribe to every one of its principles.

It affirms the most fundamental human rights: liberty of thought, conscience and faith; the exercise of civil and political rights; the rights of minorities.

It calls for a freer flow of information, ideas, and people; greater scope for the press; cultural and educational exchange; family reunification; the right to travel and to marriage between nations of different states; protection of the priceless heritage of our diverse cultures.

And it reaffirms the basic principles of relations between states: nonintervention, sovereign equality, self-determination, territorial integrity, and the inviolability of frontiers other than through peaceful change.

The United States has always been realistic about the Helsinki process. We did not expect it to resolve all of the difficult security issues we face in an era of ideological conflict and military competition. We knew, from the beginning, that some would distort it to reinforce the division of the continent and the domination of Eastern Europe by the Soviet Union, despite the Final Act's clear reaffirmation of freedom, political independence, sovereignty, self-determination, and noninterference.

Thus, when heads of state and government met in Helsinki in 1975 to conclude the first conference and sign the Final Act, the United States took the position that hope had to be tempered by realism and backed up by effort. President Ford expressed it well on that occasion:

> "History will judge this conference not by what we say here today, but by what we do tomorrow—not by the promises we make, but by the promises we keep." [56]

Reflecting on the experience of the last 8 years, we must be disappointed, but we cannot be surprised, that the years since then have seen many setbacks for our effort to strengthen security, expand cooperation, build mutual confidence, and protect human rights.

The record speaks for itself.

There are governments in the East which have from the outset treated their commitments to human rights under the Final Act with open contempt. The Helsinki monitoring groups that citizens created to gauge their governments' performance have been systematically suppressed. Emigration, after an initial rise, has fallen dramatically. Dissidents have been subjected to ever more brutal treatment. And courageous men and women who dared to assert their human rights—or demonstrate for peace and arms control—are rotting in prison or condemned to mental hospitals.

Similarly, within 2 years of signing the document pledging a commitment to the pursuit of peace, the Soviet Union began deploying SS–20 intermediate-range nuclear missiles with multiple warheads on each, aimed at the peoples of Europe and Asia, endangering the balance of power and creating an enormous security problem.

Six years after signing a document pledging a commitment to sovereignty, independence, and self-determination, the Soviet Union coerced Poland into suppressing a free trade union movement whose only crime was to take workers' rights seriously in what claims to be a workers' state.

And most recently, just days after accepting here a new document of still stronger commitments than those of the Final Act, the Soviet Union has ruthlessly taken the lives of 269 innocent people on a defenseless civilian airplane. And from this rostrum, its Foreign Minister shamelessly insisted that the Soviet Union would do so again, thus again demonstrating its callous disregard for human life.

These blatant acts of Soviet defiance against the spirit and the letter of the Helsinki Accords have presented this Madrid meeting with its basic challenge. By accepting that challenge and insisting on injecting an element of accountability into the process, Madrid has saved the act from becoming an historic irrelevancy.

Let us look at the ideals of Helsinki as they relate to the realities of today.

In the security field, we and our allies seek to enhance European security at the lowest possible levels of arms. We are energetically involved in all ongoing negotiations. We welcome the newly scheduled conference on confidence- and security-building measures and disarmament. We know that the essence of security is mutual security. Unfortunately, as the fate of Korean Airlines Flight 007 once again reminds us, the Soviet Union defines its security in a way so absolute, self-centered, and cynical that it poses a danger to all other countries.

The SS–20's targeted on Western Europe and Asia dramatize the danger to us all. These missiles threaten international confidence and international stability. They are part of a steady and continuing Soviet aim for global military power far beyond any conceivable defensive needs. Their deployment began in 1977. On November 2, 1977, after about a dozen of these weapons had been deployed, Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev declared: "We do not want to upset the approximate equilibrium at present . . . between East and West in Central Europe, or between the USSR and the United States." [57] Whether or not one agreed on the precise nature of the military balance at that point, a natural question arises as to why the Soviet Union has proceeded since 1977 to deploy more SS–20's at a feverish pace, for a present total of over 350 launchers and over 1,050 warheads. If there was balance then with a dozen or so weapons, it is difficult to deny that today, there must be an imbalance that requires redress.

That balance will be redressed by the Atlantic alliance in the absence of an equal, verifiable agreement to limit them. The Soviet response to this, unfortunately, has been less genuine negotiation and more unilateral threats. The democratic nations will resist such threats, which poison the atmosphere and are inconsistent with the genuine pursuit of security and cooperation. If no agreement is reached by the end of this year, NATO counterdeployments will begin. But we, for our part, are willing to keep on trying to reach agreement with the Soviet Union. In addition to tipping the military balance, the Soviet Union and its allies embarked—in the immediate aftermath of the Helsinki Final Act—on a course of geopolitical aggression in Africa, the Middle East, and Southwest Asia. Cuban armies under Soviet direction intervened in Angola, Ethiopia, and South Yemen; Vietnamese armies invaded Kampuchea, pioneering in the technology of chemical and toxin warfare against civilians; and the Soviet army invaded Afghanistan.

The United States is fully aware that the Final Act stresses, "The close link between peace and security in Europe and in the world as a whole." We will work with those who seek peaceful solutions in regional conflicts, consistent with the desires and interests of the peoples concerned, in Southeast and Southwest Asia, in southern Africa, and in Central America and the Caribbean.

We support that provision of the Final Act which treats economic relations as "an essential sector" of cooperation. But, "their cooperation in this field," says the Final Act, "should take place in full respect for the principles guiding relations among participating states." The steady growth in East–West economic exchanges that marked the early 1970's has slowed and leveled off. The geopolitical developments I have just mentioned have contributed to this drop. But it is partly the result as well of the oil crisis and world economic recession; and partly the result of the structural inefficiencies of the East's central economic planning.

It is ironic that a system claiming to exemplify the principles of the world's only truly "scientific" economic theory should have to resort to emulating Western methods, borrowing Western funds, and purchasing Western food and technology, in order to sustain its performance. Nevertheless, we continue to hope that nonstrategic trade, proceeding on sound commercial terms, can make at least some long-range contribution to constructive East–West relations.

In reaching the vital question of human rights, the central point to make is that they are not just a separate "basket" of issues but an integral part of the whole subject of security and cooperation. As the Final Act declares, respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms is "an essential factor for the peace, justice and well-being necessary to ensure the development of friendly relations and cooperation."

Here we arrive at the heart of the matter. What is the real reason that progress in the Helsinki process is such an uphill struggle? What is it that security and cooperation in Europe fundamentally depend upon? What are the real, basic obstacles to security and cooperation in Europe?

It all comes down to the question: Why is Europe divided?

We all know the answer. Europe was divided by force, and it remains divided by force—the force of a system that as a matter of both principle and practice is opposed to the free movement of people and ideas. This is a system that built a wall to keep ideas out and people in. This is a system that fears foreign radio broadcasts even more, perhaps, than it fears missiles.

Yet experience has shown that no wall is high enough, no jamming station strong enough, to keep out ideas or to keep down the hopes of men and women who yearn for freedom. The division of Europe is today, as it always was, unnatural and inhuman. Therefore, the attempt to keep Europe divided by raw power is inevitably a source of instability. There can be no lasting security or cooperation in Europe as long as one Government is afraid of its own people and seeks reassurance in imposing a system of force on its people and on its neighbors.

There will always be heroes who will not let us forget, and who give their would-be masters no rest: Polish workers, Czech intellectuals, East German clergy and peace demonstrators, and Soviet dissidents of all faiths and from all walks of life who risk life and livelihood for the cause of liberty. The Soviet Union would earn great credit for itself in the spirit of Helsinki if it allowed these heroes who want to leave the Soviet Union to do so. The right to emigrate is a vital principle acknowledged in the universal declaration of human rights. As this Jewish New Year begins, let us hope that the coming year will see major progress toward freer emigration. Yet our concern is not only for those who wish to leave but for those who remain. The condition of their lives in the spirit of Helsinki and Madrid, is an important barometer of the true condition of security and cooperation in Europe.

In the most profound sense, the Helsinki process represents an historic effort to erode the cruel divisions between East and West in Europe. It is an effort that must continue because it embodies the most basic interests, deepest convictions, and highest hopes of all the peoples in Europe. Though this Conference is coming to a close, our concern for human rights is enduring, and we will continue to advance this cause in every appropriate forum. We will continue to speak the truth. The struggle for human rights is unstoppable, and it remains a priority of American foreign policy.

As the Madrid review meeting nears its end, I want to pay tribute here to the able leadership of the distinguished head of our delegation, Ambassador Max Kampelman. In speaking to this meeting, he spoke for a united country, for an American people united in supporting peace and united in its commitment to human dignity. And he helped with others to forge the unity among the Western democracies without which even the modest progress we have made would have been impossible.

After almost 3 years of patient negotiation, we have a document that will expand and improve upon the 1975 Final Act. It adds important new commitments with respect to human rights, trade union freedoms, religious liberties, reunification of families, free flow of information, and measures against terrorism. It also provides, significantly, for followup in the human rights and security fields.

A human rights meeting is scheduled in Ottawa in 1985, a meeting on human contacts in Bern in early 1986, and a full review conference in Vienna in late 1986. We hope that the Soviet Union will at long last pay heed to the concerns frequently expressed by many of us in Madrid, and respond to those concerns.

A conference on confidence- and security-building measures and disarmament will convene in Stockholm in early 1984. The United States will negotiate seriously to reach agreement on militarily significant, politically binding and verifiable measures applicable to the whole of Europe. We also look forward to the meeting of experts on the peaceful settlement of disputes scheduled for Athens in 1984.

The presence here of a distinguished congressional delegation signifies the dedication of my country to the Helsinki process and to the quest for security and cooperation in Europe.

We challenge the Soviet Union to undertake a serious dialog on the full range of outstanding issues, with the goal of settling problems and reducing tensions. For our part, we will continue to negotiate patiently in good faith and will consider any proposals that meet our basic objective of enhancing true security and cooperation.

As sober realists, we are—and must be—prepared for continued and often arduous competition. Yet we also believe that this competition can—and must be—conducted in a way that leaves room for practical agreements that push back the specter of major conflict. In the nuclear age, this is our mutual responsibility. It is my government's solemn commitment.

As President Reagan declared last July 15: "We will not flag in our continued determination to work with all governments and peoples whose goal is the strengthening of peace in freedom. As Madrid has shown, dialog, when based on realistic expectations and conducted with patience, can produce results. These results are often gradual and hard won, but they are the necessary building blocks for a more secure and stable world." [58]

Thank you very much.

New U.S. Initiatives for an Interim INF Agreement and verifiable arms control agreements with the Soviet Union.

On September 3, I met with Ambassador Nitze to discuss the INF negotiations in Geneva and to reaffirm my commitment to seeking a successful result in those talks.

Since then, the United States has held extensive consultations with our NATO Allies and Japan regarding the U.S. position in the talks. These consultations have included both direct correspondence between myself and Allied leaders, meetings of the NATO Special Consultative Group, and bilateral consultations with the Japanese.

In those consultations, suggestions for U.S. initiatives to move the negotiations forward were offered. These suggestions were welcomed by Allied leaders, who reaffirmed their strong support for the U.S. negotiating effort. Our NATO Allies also reaffirmed their commitment to the NATO double-track decision.

Based on the results of these consultations, Ambassador Nitze has received new instructions to pursue these U.S. initiatives with the Soviet negotiators in Geneva.

These initiatives represent significant further development of the U.S. proposal for an interim agreement which the United States put forward last March. They address a number of Soviet concerns.

The U.S. action in taking these additional steps is further demonstration of U.S. commitment, and that of our allies, to achieving a positive outcome in the Geneva talks.

We call on the Soviet Union to respond in a constructive manner to these proposals, so that the Geneva negotiations can arrive at a positive result.

Statement by the U.S. Representative at the MBFR Negotiations (Abramowitz) Before a Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, September 22, 1983 [60]

Western Response to Eastern MBFR Proposals

Mr. Chairman [61] and members of the committee, I am pleased to be here to report to the committee on the MBFR negotiations since I took over the U.S. delegation in mid-March. I will review developments and offer some general observations. In brief, there have been important developments, but there remain basic differences.

Before I begin, I should point out that we have agreed with the East to maintain a rule of confidentiality about our negotiations. Each side, of course, makes public certain aspects of its position, but we must be able to negotiate in private. I know you will understand, therefore, that I am limited in what I can say in open session. In order to be as responsive as I can to questions, I suggest if we can we move to closed session after my statement.

As you know, the West tabled a draft treaty in July 1982, [62] which represented a major change in the Western approach on how to proceed with the large-scale reductions required to reach the agreed-upon goal of parity. For 9 years, the West had insisted that the United States and the Soviet Union negotiate their reductions first, to enhance confidence for subsequent negotiations on overall Eastern and Western reductions to parity.

With its draft treaty, the West altered this two-step process and instead called for all reductions to parity to be agreed and spelled out in one agreement, and for the agreed common ceiling of 700,000 ground forces for each side to be reached within 7 years.

Having thus met a long-held Eastern interest in linking the initial United States-Soviet reductions to the subsequent reductions of the other participants, particularly the Federal Republic of Germany, the Western draft treaty had the effect of isolating and highlighting the two major remaining issues—data and verification. Western negotiators called on the East to move on these two issues in return.

Let me briefly review these two issues.

The issue of data has a long, unhappy history. The background is that when the East finally tabled its data on its own forces in 1976, it chose to use figures showing an approximate parity in ground forces already existing between East and West in central Europe, and to claim it had used Western definitions for calculating these figures. In fact, using these definitions the East enjoyed a superiority of some 150,000 men.

This discrepancy in starting force levels results in a major problem: How many Eastern forces must be reduced to reach the agreed 700,000 common ceiling? After 7 years of debate, no progress has been made in resolving this disagreement through normal negotiating efforts.

The East refuses to discuss the differences in detail. It has stated that it will not back away from its official data and that further discussion of the data dispute is fruitless. The East now suggests that progress is possible only if the sides forget about data and approach the problem of reductions from another angle.

The history of the verification issue is not as long. The West tabled its specific proposals only in 1979. The Western position has been that national technical means of verification must be supplemented by cooperative verification measures, including onsite inspection, exchange of information, and the establishment of exit/entry points with observers. Only through such measures could we enhance confidence in verifying an agreement involving manpower and resolve disputes.

The East has finally acknowledged the importance of cooperative verification measures and no longer insists that national technical means are sufficient. The East now appears to accept many elements of the Western proposals, including the principle of onsite inspection. The Eastern position still falls short of Western requirements, but we have here opportunities for probing and for much improved dialog between the sides.

As a response to the Western draft treaty of 1982, the East in February suggested a new approach, calling on the West to take a political decision to begin reductions immediately, while continuing work on a formal agreement for both sides to reduce to parity within 3 years. The East has designed its proposals to avoid the data issue: Instead of focusing on starting force levels, where we are now, the East proposes to focus on the verification of the end result, the 700,000 common ceiling.

The East argues that it does not matter where the sides started, as long as each side is assured of where we end up. In effect, the East is offering some prospect of flexibility on verification in exchange for the West dropping its requirement for prior agreed data.

To summarize briefly, the Eastern proposals consist of three elements:

First, initial United States-Soviet reductions by mutual example, that is, outside the framework of a formal agreement. The East proposes U.S. reductions of 13,000 and Soviet reductions of 20,000, in the form of units, with the armaments associated with these units withdrawn as well. These reductions would begin this year and would be completed within 1 year. The East has agreed to some cooperative verification measures to help verify that these reductions took place.

The second element is, following these initial reductions, a political commitment by each side not to increase their forces or armaments in the area of reductions. This commitment would be in effect while the sides negotiate the remaining reductions. No cooperative verification of such a commitment would be in place.

The third element: the sides would undertake, in a formal agreement, reductions to the agreed common collective ceiling of 900,000, with no more than 700,000 ground force manpower and no more than 200,000 in air force manpower.

This third element was embodied in a draft agreement tabled in June. The agreement provides for the reductions to be completed within 3 years and for each side to determine for itself the amount of reductions necessary to reach parity, thus avoiding the requirement for prior agreement on force levels.

After all reductions have been taken and the agreed common ceilings reached, the East proposes a set of cooperative verification measures to help verify that each side has in fact reached the agreed levels and adheres to them for the duration of the agreement. These measures include the establishment of exit and entry points with observers, an exchange of information on forces remaining in the area, and onsite inspection on a mutually acceptable basis.

I do not want to speculate about Soviet motives in presenting these proposals. Suffice it to say that the East has made some movement in its position on verification, however still inadequate on the whole. The East has in effect declared the data issue dead and has moved somewhat onto Western ground on the verification issue.

There are serious difficulties with the Eastern position. One fundamental problem with the East's conceptual approach for avoiding the data issue is that it leaves undetermined and undeterminable the amount of Eastern reductions necessary to reach the agreed common ceiling. The Eastern approach would leave us in a situation of great uncertainty for the 3 years of the reduction process. We would have no way of assuring ourselves what the East was reducing and whether it was reducing its full complement.

The East offers only one cooperative verification measure for helping to monitor actual reductions—a willingness to invite observers to witness the reduction of the largest contingents. That hardly inspires confidence.

Another drawback is the lack of specifics in their verification proposals. The Eastern onsite inspection measure remains essentially voluntary. The West has explained that such a measure should provide the clear right of each side to conduct inspections during and after the reductions process, and the obligation of each side to allow such inspections as a matter of course.

The East also has not specified how much information they would be willing to exchange on forces remaining in the area. Such an exchange is crucial to enhanced confidence in verification, and the West has explained that there should be full agreement at the outset on the level of detail of the information to be exchanged. We have also stressed that an exchange of information must not be delayed until reductions are completed.

In short, we remain uncertain whether the East is willing to accept the type of verification measures we consider necessary.

The West has welcomed the Eastern moves on verification as an indication of Eastern willingness to consider a realistic framework for monitoring compliance with an agreement. At the same time, we have noted that further substantial progress will be required if we are to arrive at an effective verification system.

We have explained our basic requirements for any agreement: The extent of obligations incurred in an agreement must be clear and we must be confident that these obligations are being met. We have told the East that we will study their recent proposals in a constructive spirit in order to judge how they can contribute to progress in the negotiations. We are doing that right now. On our part, we have urged the East to take fully into account our fundamental requirements for a verifiable agreement.

I do not mean to imply we are nearing Nirvana. Our dialog has improved and hopefully will continue to do so, but there remain formidable difficulties in reaching agreement. There are inherent complexities in these negotiations, as well as basic differences in approach between East and West. For example, very briefly:

The subject matter of these negotiations touches upon some extremely difficult issues, such as the role of conventional forces in our overall defense and deterrent policies and the relationship between manpower and armaments.

There are some inherent uncertainties with regard to the monitoring and verification of any manpower agreement, and these uncertainties require us to look at the verification problem differently and take extra efforts to insure that obligations are understood and verifiable. The MBFR problem is not the same as the SALT and START problem and cannot be addressed in the same way.

Finally, there are the differences of approach. In MBFR, the sides probably do have some irreconcilable differences in terms of their views of their security position and requirements in Europe, although this does not necessarily preclude identification of an area of common interest sufficient to reach an agreement.

But the sides approach the problem of negotiating an agreement differently, and these differences are highlighted in the Eastern and Western positions now on the table in Vienna. The West seeks to develop an agreement very strictly, attempting to regulate every detail in order to reduce uncertainty. The East, on the other hand, tends to apply a broad political brush to the problem and is willing to go along with a degree of uncertainty and a lack of clarity which we find unacceptable. It tends to substitute good faith and good will for concrete verification. We hope this is changing.

These underlying and inherent problems with the MBFR negotiations make an agreement difficult. That is of course one reason the negotiations have been going on 10 years. This description of the difficulties of reaching a force reduction agreement obviously does not mean we should give up on our efforts. None of these difficulties is impossible to overcome, and progress has been made.

Moreover, the potential value of a force reduction agreement in central Europe, both political and military value, makes it incumbent upon us to strive energetically and imaginatively for a sound agreement.
